The Congress made loans mandatory, under certain conditions, on three commodities, namely, cotton, corn, and wheat. On cotton and wheat the minimum rate of the loan is 52 percent of parity price and the maximum rate of the loan is 75 percent of parity, but within these limits the rate of loan is discretionary. In the case of corn, the rate of loan is fixed by a statutory formula, but within the same percentage of parity limits. Loans are also prohibited by law on any of these three commodities with respect to which a vote is taken on marketing quotas and fails to be approved by a required two-thirds majority, under the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938.

Loans to associations of producers are made directly by Commodity Credit Corporation. Practically all of the loans to individual producers, however—which represent the vast majority of the total loans—are made indirectly through private lending agencies. In nearly all instances the private lending agency is the producer's local bank, which extends a loan on conditions specified by the Commodity Credit Corporation and on loan forms provided by the Corporation. The local bank receives a guaranty from the Corporation to purchase the note upon demand at its face value plus accrued interest at the rate of 2 percent for all commodities except grain. In the case of grain, the guaranteed minimum rate to be earned by the local lending agency is somewhat less, namely, 1½ percent, in view of the fact that an especially large amount of work in connection with the making of grain loans is performed by county agricultural conservation committees rather than by the local lending agencies. The difference between the rate of 3 percent charged all producers on all Commodity Credit Corporation loans and the lesser rate of interest obtained by the local lending agency represents the margin to compensate Commodity Credit Corporation for its operating expenses and risk of loss.

The loans by Commodity Credit Corporation have meant the difference to producers of between 25-cent and 57-cent corn, 35-cent and 60-cent wheat, 15-cent and 25-cent butter, 5-cent and 10-cent cotton, and so forth. The commodity-loan programs administered by the Corporation are an important part of the general farm program, and in the financial sense such loan programs constitute the ever-normal granary. The purpose of the loans is to raise and stabilize farm prices, and, when properly coordinated or correlated with adequate programs under the Agricultural Adjustment Act for production or market adjustment, these objectives can readily be achieved without undue burden on the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Carl B. Robbins, President of the Commodity Credit Corporation, testified before the House Banking and Currency Committee that the loans made under the Corporation's commodity-loan programs have aggregated more than $1,500,000,000, of which more than $650,000,000 have been liquidated, with a total actual loss to the Government of less than $25,000,000. While Mr. Robbins declined to make anything in the nature of an official estimate before the committee, he did advise, in response to questions propounded, that a rough preliminary estimate indicated the amount the Corporation would be required to pay into the Treasury this year by reason of its net worth exceeding $100,000,000, based upon an appraisal to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury as of March 31, 1940, in accordance with the act of March 8, 1938—Public Law No. 442, Seventy-fifth Congress—would be between $35,000,000 and $100,000,000.

Not only has Commodity Credit Corporation demonstrated that farm prices can be raised and stabilized by commodity-loan programs, but present indications are that Commodity Credit Corporation will be called upon to meet many demands for financing agricultural production in connection with adjustments made necessary by the European war. One such situation developed last fall in the case of flue-cured tobacco. A large percentage of the American production of this type of tobacco is sold to England, which normally carries about a 2-year stock on hand in the course of the curing process. Almost immediately with the outbreak of hostilities in Europe, Great Britain found itself in a position in which it felt that it had to discontinue using its exchange for purchasing additional supplies of tobacco in order to be able to purchase other American products, and the English companies withdrew from the American tobacco markets. Our farmers faced such ruinously low prices that it was necessary to close the flue-cured tobacco markets. Fortunately, Commodity Credit Corporation was able to develop promptly a program for financing the acquisition and carrying of these tobacco inventories over the emergency period. This made possible the reopening of the markets and enabled farmers to sell their crop of flue-cured tobacco at prices substantially the same as those that had prevailed before the emergency. We may have a similar experience in cotton and other commodities.

I call this situation to the attention of the House because I and some of my colleagues on the Banking and Currency Committee felt that the increase in borrowing power requested by the Commodity Credit Corporation might not prove to be sufficient because of recent developments in the European war. Mr. Robbins testified before the committee that the increase in borrowing power of $500,000,000 was predicated upon conservative estimates of the Corporation's needs for financing 1940 production submitted to the Bureau of the Budget prior to the spread of war to the Low Countries and the Mediterranean. No change was made by the committee, but there was a full appreciation of the fact that it might be necessary for the Commodity Credit Corporation to request a further increase in its borrowing power at the next session of the Congress if the war should continue to spread and further disrupt our export outlets for the crops now growing.

I strongly urge the necessity of H. R. 9931, as recommended by the Banking and Currency Committee.

It is imperative that this bill pass, and I hope there will not be a vote against it, due to the grave situation the world over at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, "Drinking will not drown your sorrow: It will only irrigate it." So again today we drink at the fountain of the Treasury to the tune of $500,000,000 further to irrigate the drunken orgy of raiding the Public Treasury. This bill should not be discussed by itself alone; it is one of many of the same order.

The gentleman from Michigan says we have a lion by the tail. I thought the usual animal was a bull that we had by the tail. It does not matter; we have the gold purchase by the tail; we have the silver fiasco by the tail; and we have a host of other schemes by the tail that we must let run their courses until the Treasury and our credit is finally exhausted.

I congratulate the gentleman from Georgia. Is it not wonderful that he can convince himself and stand bravely here with boldness and assurance and say: "Behold! This Corporation lost only $25,000,000." I was once in a business where I kept it bolstered up pretty well for 10 years, but finally had to take the great loss that was painfully evident for some time before. Bookkeeping devices served to give me false courage.

I congratulate you on your Mr. Robbins. He made a competent witness, and yet he says, as will be found on page 9 of the hearings, the page they quote so often, that "on that which we have disposed of we have lost only about $25,000,000." See the possibilities of misunderstanding in it! "On that which we have disposed of." But what about those vast amounts of 5 or 6 years in storage, when that is disposed of?

Mr. JOHNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. JOHNS. I notice on page 6 of the hearings that Mr. Robbins stated that approximately $650,000,000 of the loans that have been made by the Corporation have been repaid and that in addition the Corporation has liquidated approximately $400,000,000 of loans by taking over the pledged commodities.

Mr. GIFFORD. And they have sold some of those taken over and it would appear they have taken a loss of not over $25,000,000.

Mr. JOHNS. How much have they disposed of?

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not know but it has been stated that we will have over a million bales of cotton, probably 1,200,000 bales of cotton that we will own, and we are today irrigating it. The gentleman from Georgia did not tell you that we must have $90,000,000 this year for carrying charges alone. How about that loss? The future will tell a different and sadder story.

This bookkeeping business is most deceiving until the books are closed. We even carry the feed loans made to the farmers in 1921 at face value. There has been no loss on the books as yet. That is New Deal bookkeeping. The thing is so ridiculous. But we will irrigate today by $500,000,000 more. The gentleman from Georgia knows and everybody else knows, there will be a frightful loss by this Commodity Credit Corporation in the final result. They have only $33,000,000 left now to lend, and their commitments are very heavy for this year already on account of loss of the foreign markets. They must have this $500,000,000 additional at risk. Besides that, if they should dispose of some of their holdings they will have that money to use. This new industry, this storage of cotton, to which the gentleman from Michigan referred, has been highly profitable to some people. New England had a little bite of it lately. After strenuous efforts we have procured a little of it, and they tell us we will probably have that cotton for a good long time. I led the applause for the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] when he was given credit for the reduction from more than 20 cents a bale to as low as 8 cents a bale. We are in New England taking it for about 8 cents a bale.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the quality of cotton improve with age?

Mr. GIFFORD. I presume everything improves with age with the New Deal behind it. I listen to these boastful statements made about the competency of the New Deal. I wish I had the time to comment on them. There is one answer that should be sufficient reply. We will have a public debt of $60,000,000,000, and with one breath and in one sentence you can brush their boastful claims into the river. That is a sufficient and complete answer for the meager results that you have obtained. Another answer is the present frame of mind of the people of this Nation. As I said yesterday, they want ships, they want guns, but they do not want conscription. They want all of these largesses and these things that have been handed to them by the New Deal at the expense of future generations. Lest I forget, I want to remind you of the present set-up.

We have had Jesse Jones supervising this proposition for some time, but we will not have Jesse Jones any longer. The full voting power now is in the hands of one man, the Santa Claus that you selected as your Vice President. You certainly picked him because he is your Santa Claus. He stands for largesses, and he has the complete and full authority now. Jesse Jones will be heard from no more, and he will be sadly missed.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman agree that it is entirely fitting that one Santa Claus should have another Santa Claus running with him?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, it is wonderful. We can recite present conditions, but it is laughable, it is utterly ridiculous with this tremendous amount of money involved, with the $90,000,000 carrying charges this year, for anyone to boastfully say they have lost only $25,000,000. Every March 31 they will have their books audited and the market value will be ascertained. But they are not going to sell that cotton. They will have to hold it a long time. The expenses will run along. The loss in the end will be tremendous. My good friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], of whom I think so much, down in his heart cannot believe, with the conditions as they are, that we will only lose $25,000,000.

We have appropriated $213,000,000 for the capital stock. I am trying to find out from the record here how it is that of the $213,000,000 they have accounted for only $100,000,000. There are $113,000,000 in there some place that would seem to have been lost. On page 9 Mr. Robbins said—I repeat:

> On that which we have already disposed we have lost $25,000,000.

How misleading it may be. But it is like all Treasury bookkeeping. You have heard me complain so many times about Treasury bookkeeping. It is a fraud on the people, such a fraud that we marked off one day two and one-half billion dollars of fake assets at one stroke that had been carried as real assets in the Treasury. This is simply a continuation of it.

Mr. PACE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Can I help the gentleman?

Mr. PACE. The testimony is that $650,000,000 of these loans have been liquidated.

Mr. GIFFORD. No; repaid.

Mr. PACE. So a $25,000,000 loss is not such an enormous percentage of the loans made, handled, and liquidated?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; not if I pick the right bale to be disposed of. For some of this you paid a higher price. You have had carrying charges on it for years. I do not know where those charges have been met. It looks to me as if in this method of bookkeeping they have been hidden somewhere. They are not actually charged up where they ought to be. As I say, this Treasury bookkeeping has forced me—and it ought to force you—to look with suspicion on all of this. You have bolstered these schemes in order to keep them from disclosing real conditions; but the fact is that, though you started with perhaps $300,000,000, now you want $1,400,000,000; next year you may want $2,000,000,000, and Heaven knows where the end will be.

You cannot let go of the tail. How well that applies to this particular experiment.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STEAGALL. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the testimony of Mr. Robbins on page 9 shows that the $213,000,000 referred to by the gentleman still stands as a protection against future losses, except as it has been reduced by the $25,000,000 losses that have been sustained up to this time on the transactions that have been closed.

Mr. GIFFORD. I have read and reread in the last few days page 9, but I still am looking for the fellow in the woodpile. I know he is there.

Mr. GIFFORD. I believe my time has been exhausted. I should not take more. However, I will take 2 more minutes, although I ought not to take those 2 minutes away from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD]. He knows more about this than anybody else. He has traveled this country over looking at these storage plants. He is a fund of information on this subject. He deserves a tremendous amount of credit not only for this study but for many other things to which he has given his attention. I should not take his time, but I hope there is Yankee enough left in me yet that you do not pull the wool over my eyes in these matters. It is my job to watch these expenditures, and I have been watching them. I have indeed studied them. Many Sundays have I devoted to the Treasury bookkeeping and its reports. I have reason now to no longer have confidence in them. Let us not consider this wholly by itself, but let us consider all the other foolishments that you have embarked upon and that you dare not stop. The gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] whom I admire so much, is going to talk again on Monday. He has been trying to solve these problems for a long time. He has given much of himself. Has he got anywhere? Not yet. He votes consistently for these appropriations, but must know they are fundamentally unsound.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman has been referring to what the people will discover some day. Does not the gentleman believe the people will also discover some day that no one yet has devised a system of government that is superior to simple arithmetic?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; they will come to such realization. But in our democracy how many crimes can be committed of this sort? No one in authority dares to call a halt. We Republicans are quite helpless. You give me a secretary at $91 a month to do typewriting, but you will not give me an expert who would be helpful to dig the truth of these matters, despite the position I hold on the expenditures committee. I wish I could have such competent help. Much could be disclosed. However, the people will not be misled forever by these false assurances, knowing the public debt is mounting into the frightening sum of sixty billions of dollars. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, during the past few months we have been appropriating millions, yes, billions, for national defense. I believe this to be very proper on account of the condition confronting this country because of a destructive war that is now going on in Europe. I want to call to your attention that perhaps never in the history of our country have we had more serious problems, especially farm problems, than we are going to have in the coming years, regardless of who wins the war in Europe.

If we fail to appropriate this money so as to have it available to carry on a proper, common sense, and orderly distribution of the farm products of the country, it is going to be impossible to build a successful national defense. Unless it is possible to have a well-rounded, well-balanced, and successful agriculture it is going to be impossible to have a real well-rounded and successful national defense. A successful agriculture is definitely a major part of a successful defense program.

As a rule, farm commodities, especially cotton, are about the best collateral you can get for loans, especially according to the amount loaned on cotton per pound. Now we are confronted with a considerable number of millions of bales of cotton on hand at this time. The prospect is for about a 12,000,000-bale crop this year. Unless this Government is in a position to make a reasonable loan on cotton, and I am hoping that it will be made from the beginning of the cotton season so that the small farmer will be in position to take advantage of it, there is nothing to keep cotton from going to 3 or 4 cents a pound, which would mean destruction to the South. Anything that destroys the agricultural South will affect every other section of the country.

I call the attention of my friends on my left to this fact, that I am deeply interested in their problem—western agriculture—and I wish to say to you that if you can help the South work out its serious problem at this time and in the future it will mean everything to every other agricultural section of the country. For the reason, if we fail in cotton or if we have to reduce considerably the number of bales we are now producing, it simply means that the South will be driven into dairying, hog producing, and the production of every other type of commodity that you raise in every other section of the country. All of our products will then be in competition with yours, and the cause of agriculture will be defeated all over this country.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. If this bill fails to pass, the producer of corn and wheat will not be able to borrow any money, will he?

Mr. FULMER. I am sure of that, and it is just as important to the salvation of the corn and wheat farmer as it is to the cotton and tobacco farmers. This is a national proposition.

This is not a cotton bill. I hope sometime in considering agriculture we will take a national viewpoint in connection with trying to solve the agricultural problem, because you cannot solve it in one section of the country, perhaps, without destroying the other sections, unless you cooperate on a common-sense basis to be helpful to every section of the country. It is just as necessary at this time to appropriate this money and have it available to relieve agriculture as it is to appropriate money to build up your national defense to save this country, because, as stated before, unless we can place agriculture on a sound and successful basis it is going to be impossible to place our national-defense program on a sound and successful basis. I call to your attention the invasion of some of the Scandinavian countries by Germany, and what a splendid fight the people of those countries put up in that instance, all because from an agricultural standpoint they were prosperous and happy and had something to fight for. I am hoping this bill will pass overwhelmingly because of what it means to agriculture in every section of the country, to business, and to a successful defense program. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to build somewhat of a background on which we may stand for a few minutes, at least, and look forward just a little bit as to the rough spots in the road that we may run into in connection with cotton and some of our other crops.

Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, speaking some time ago before the American Farm Economic Association, made these interesting, and I think truthful, remarks:

> Cotton and tobacco, the principal crops of the South, are both export products. We normally sell half or more of these crops abroad. The average annual value of cotton exports from 1875 to 1910 amounted to $260,000,000. During these same years the average favorable balance of merchandise exports from this country amounted to $250,000,000. This was a period when it was generally considered that the United States was prosperous, a period when the principal and interest of our foreign debts were being paid off. In other words, cotton exports played no small part in paying for the industrialization of this country in the nineteenth century. If 90 percent or more of the cotton crop were domestically consumed it might not be difficult to attain parity income from cotton production. But whether we like it or not, that is not the case. American cotton depends on foreign buyers for a large part of its consumption. Suppose, for example, that our cotton producers during the last few years had received a parity price for that portion of the crop domestically consumed. World prices for the remainder of the crop, even with normal production, would leave the farmers' income from cotton much below parity, possibly 25 percent to 30 percent.

And in this same address the Secretary goes ahead to point out:

> It should be borne in mind that this increase in foreign acreage and cotton production—

Referring to the increase in China, Russia, Uganda, Brazil, and other areas—> has taken place while the world price of cotton was on a very low level. About 10 years ago foreign countries produced around 10,000,000 bales of cotton for the equivalent of approximately $900,000,000 in American money. In recent years foreign countries have produced around 16,000,000 bales of cotton for an equivalent of around $600,000,000 in American money. These foreign countries are now growing 60 percent more cotton for about 30 percent less money than they did 10 years ago.

Cotton authorities inform us that during the past 10 years, under some 13 cotton programs which this Congress has acted upon, we have paid out from the United States Treasury in round figures approximately $1,400,000,000 for this one crop alone.

It is interesting to observe that while we were doing this and while we were cutting the cotton acreage approximately 46 percent throughout the country, the balance of the world was increasing the production of cotton from 10,000,000 bales up to 16,000,000 bales per annum, as the Secretary of Agriculture has pointed out.

In the May 1940 issue of a trade report put out by the New York Cotton Exchange, it is pointed out:

> It may be readily calculated that a consumption totaling roughly 4,000,000 bales, has already been lost—

Referring to exports for the current year—> or is now in process of being lost, not counting the possible further loss of 1,000,000 bales if the war should spread to southeastern Europe.

I think we can take it for granted that the war, since that date, has spread to the area referred to.

In the same report of the New York Cotton Exchange we find that in 1936 the countries of South America, Brazil, Argentina, and Peru, had supplies of cotton, 478-pound bales, of 2,033,000 bales. In 1938 that had jumped to 2,293,000 bales, in 1939 to 2,480,000 bales, and in 1940 to 2,510,000 bales, in these three producing areas of the South American countries.

In looking over the text of the Habana Declaration on Inter-American Economics, under Habana date line of July 30, only this morning I checked this with the State Department to see if this was the text of the declaration agreed to by the 21 countries that sat around the table at Habana the other day, and we find this interesting information, and for the information of the House I have already obtained permission to insert this entire statement in the RECORD.

The convention down there established what is known as an Inter-American Economic and Financial Consultative Committee. That consultative committee has been charged by the 21 countries to—

> (A) Cooperate with each country on this continent in a study of the possible measures for the increase of internal consumption of its own export surpluses of those fundamental products of the economic life of the same.

Then, under (C)—

> (C) Create instruments of inter-American cooperation for warehousing, financing, and transitory disposition of the surpluses of said products, as well as for their orderly and systematic distribution and sale, taking into account normal conditions of production and distribution of these products.

Mr. Chairman, within the last few years we have built up the Commodity Credit Corporation to where it must now have a capital structure of not less than $1,500,000,000; $1,400,000,000 in the way of authorized loans, and $100,000,000 in the way of contributed capital. If you will refer to page 81 and page 82 of the hearings you will find where Mr. Robbins, in answer to a question which I propounded to him at the close of the hearings takes the position that Congress should not be astonished if the Commodity Credit during the next few months calls for another $250,000,000 to $500,000,000 with which to carry on this program.

Reference has been made to cotton loans. I understand the cotton loan will probably be announced sometime shortly after August 8, when the crop reports come out. In my opinion, based on the small amount of study which I have given to this question, the Commodity Credit Corporation will be called upon to make loans on anywhere from five to seven million bales of cotton instead of 3,300,000 bales of cotton, as indicated in the hearings, if the loan is announced around 11 cents a pound. It seems to me that as we advance toward this cooperative movement between the United States of America and Latin America and the British Empire in operating a blockade against the industrial "have not" countries of Europe, that we are moving into a capital structure for the Commodity Credit Corporation of not less than $3,000,000,000 within the next 12 to 24 months. And to be added to that is whatever capital structure may be created for the Inter-American Bank and the Export-Import Bank in the handling of the surpluses of the Americas in connection with this economic declaration to which I have already referred.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. PACE. Why did the gentleman put it that way, that there would be so many bales if the loan was made at 11 cents? Has the gentleman had any intimation that the loan would be fixed at 11 cents?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have, but it is unofficial, because no member of the Department of Agriculture can give out this information positively in advance. You have to add two and two together, read between the lines, confer with the trade, read the cotton reports and comments, and draw your own conclusion. There are a lot of reasons, arguing from one viewpoint, why an 11-cent loan should be made, while others from another viewpoint say that it should not be so high. Of course, we have not the time to go into all of those things today, but my prediction is, if the loan is set at 11 cents, that the cotton carried into the Commodity Credit Corporation under this new increased-loan authorization will go far beyond the 3,300,000 bales referred to, and I am not saying that to condemn any particular approach. I am simply trying today to get before the House what, in my opinion, is the fact—that we have merely started down the road in connection with this program. Of course, on the other hand, this language is very interesting to me, where the 21 countries have declared that they will—

> Establish appropriate organisms for the distribution of a part of the surplus of any of said products as a humanitarian measure and social aid.

Mr. Chairman, definitely this whole proposition is moving into the field of sociology. There are no ifs, ands, or buts about it, but that is the fact, and I hope that any one who disagrees with that observation will take the time to try to refute it. The blue and yellow stamp money procedure here and as it is being discussed in connection with the Latin American approach further supports this view. Humanitarian measures and "social aid" goes far afield when it draws upon the Federal Treasury. We have witnessed that in connection with W. P. A. and the P. W. A. and the general relief agencies now operating. Just where is all of this leading us? Political administration of this social aid has been tried out more or less and we have the Hatch Act. Later we may have to make the law much more exacting if billions of dollars' worth of foodstuffs is also to be distributed by political appointees. Is this a means of absolutely controlling our people? We can well afford to question this method of procedure, both nationally and internationally.

On the other hand, if through some kind of socialistic approach you are going to take these surpluses and feed them out to the people, that, in turn, will interfere with your natural marketing processes and it will come back and hit you in the face, except to the extent that you, through such an approach, actually increase the amount of goods consumed.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Would the gentleman advocate selling our products, cotton or wheat, at the world price?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think the only sensible answer that could be given to a question of that kind is this: I advocate the disposition of foodstuffs, fats, fibers, and industrial products after they have been created. Having created them, let us get them distributed and consumed. Let us not put them into warehouses and say to the world, "You cannot have it." But you may say, "Oh, well, then you are not in favor of cooperating with the British Empire in the blockade." Of course, that raises the question of national defense, because here we are agreeing to continue the blockade; that is, these goods must not move to Europe through the free channels of trade.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not true that loans, for instance, on wheat, have created a domestic price on wheat far above the world price, that would not have been possible without the storage of this wheat?

Mr. CRAWFORD. That may be true, but unfortunately for the institution of wheat, unfortunately for the consumers of wheat throughout the world, we have set an artificial price on wheat and said to them in substance, "You cannot have it. We are going to keep it in storage." We have said the same thing in connection with cotton and corn, and we are going to continue to say those things.

International exchange has completely dried up. Note the absence of quotations on the franc, guilder, belga, and Danish and Norwegian krones. There is plenty of trouble these days for the foreign exchange dealers. You go to New York today and there is no exchange on the market with many, many countries of western Europe. There is no exchange being traded in. That is gone. Even the old faithful—sterling—has become a casualty. And we have seen the coming of free marks, registered marks, travelers' marks, aski marks: And there are the three categories of Italian marks. We can only touch on these things lightly, but for instance, around May 1 the insurance on cargoes moving from this country to the United Kingdom, was around 3½ percent of the value of the cargo. In July it had jumped to 7½ percent, and today it is about 12 to 15 percent to certain ports. That is another operation which runs contrary to the movement of goods in the channels of commerce. The whole process of international trade has become a nightmare and we contribute in a manner that makes it no more promising for the future. As we go into this agreement with Latin America in the name of national defense, we further interfere with the movement of goods. We do that as a defense measure, as a trade-area measure, as a parity-payment measure to farmers. At the same time, the tragedy of the whole situation is, we keep building these stocks of goods on the shelves and saying to the world, "You cannot have them." Perhaps some day they will come and make us defend the warehouses where the goods are stored. Eventually we must come down to further reduced production of goods as such, and that, in turn, means a lower standard of living for the people throughout the whole world, including the United States.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. What solution would the gentleman offer of the problem facing the cotton farmers of the Nation and the tobacco farmers of the Nation, along with the producers of other major commodities, when they are faced with a world situation which under the gentleman's suggestion would force them to curtail production of their crops to the extent of 50 percent in some instances as we are doing today in the tobacco section of the United States? We have cut our crops from 1,200,000,000 acres last year to 600,000,000 this year, and without some assistance from the Government, such as contemplated by this bill, the tobacco farmers would be faced with a disastrous situation and with bankruptcy. What would the gentleman offer as a solution of that problem?

Mr. CRAWFORD. We established in years past the objective to be obtained through the making of loans above the market value and the warehousing of the goods. In addition, through the cutting down of acreage and the cutting down of productivity, theoretically, we have moved for an entire decade along that road, and it has brought congestion in the channels of commerce. It has blocked the movement of goods to such a point now that as long as you follow that objective you have got to continue making these loans; and it is for that reason that I visualize within the next 12 to 18 months a $3,000,000,000 capital structure for the Commodity Credit Corporation, in addition to the Inter-American Bank, the Export-Import Bank, $500,000,000 of which you are going to be asked to give us for that bank within the next few days.

Now, going directly to your question, you say what suggestion do I make? The only way to unscramble an egg is to proceed to unscramble it. In doing that, somebody is going to bleed blood, unless you want to let the taxpayers, operating through the Treasury, pay the thing off in one fell swoop and thereby distribute the loss throughout the United States.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Is it not a fact that some day we will have to meet this face to face, whether we like it or not?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Of course, you will. There is no question about that. That is the reason I have never supported the program, because in my opinion it was unsound at the beginning. It has been unsound all along, and I think it is unsound today.

Mr. COOLEY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Is the gentleman in favor of the Government withdrawing its hand from extending relief to these farmers, who, according to the gentleman's own statement, would be bled white in the event they were forced to trade in the world in the troubled condition in which it is today?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will answer that question this way: I am in favor of having those who administer the Government sit down and actually tackling the bull by the horns and get this foodstuff, fats, and fibers, actually into the channels of trade and out into consumption instead of continually advancing loans, putting it on the shelf, and building higher stocks, more surpluses, and declaring to the world that they cannot have it.

If the farm operators are to be forced to depend upon such mechanics to obtain a fairly good share of the national income on what grounds can loans of only 52 percent parity be justified? On what grounds can loans less than 100 percent parity be justified? If this is to be the remedy, why does not the administration grant the loans or set the minimum price at parity values? If the objective is to prevent the goods going into export—through making above-the-market loans—then what is to be done domestically and internally when the export markets have disappeared and the Treasury is no longer able to carry the loans? The administration certainly has never answered these questions. Yet, before they are answered, declarations are agreed to with other countries of this hemisphere and to the effect we will go along with them in handling their uncontrolled surpluses. What is to be the end of all of this?

Mr. Chairman, on the basis of permission granted, I now submit for inclusion in my remarks the text of Habana Declaration on Inter-American Economics.

TEXT OF HABANA DECLARATION ON INTER-AMERICAN ECONOMICS

HABANA, July 30.—Following is the text of the Pan American Conference declaration on inter-American economics:

The Second Meeting of Ministers of State of the American Republics, considering:

That, in the first consultative meeting held in Panama, it was decided to declare that it was convenient and necessary then, more than ever, taking into consideration prevailing circumstances, to establish among those republics a sincere and strict cooperation to protect their economic and financial institutions, maintain their fiscal stability, assure the stability of their monetary systems, to promote and develop their industries, intensify their agriculture and develop their commerce;

That, in order to reach the objectives of the preceding paragraph, it was agreed to create an Inter-American Economic and Financial Consultative Committee in Washington;

That the present war has accentuated disorganization of international commerce and locs of certain markets for certain American products;

That the existence of surplus products whose exportation is essential for the economic life of the countries of America is an affair of considerable economic, social, and financial importance which concerns in general the mass of people, especially in those sectors which intervene in production and circulation of wealth of each country and, finally, for the governments of all the continent;

DIFFICULTIES SEEN AHEAD

That it is to be foreseen that these difficulties will continue as long as the war lasts and that some of them, or other new ones, will exist after the cessation of hostilities;

That it is of great importance to orientate the economic development of the American nations, diversifying their production and increasing, at the same time, their consumption;

Resolves:

1. To make the following declaration:

(a) That the American nations maintain their adhesion to liberal principles of international commerce with peaceful aims, based on equality of treatment and just and equitable procedures in interchange.

(b) That it is the purpose of the American nations to apply these principles in their mutual relations as widely as actual circumstances permit.

(c) That the American nations should prepare themselves to reestablish their commerce with all the world in accord with these principles as soon as non-American countries are disposed to do the same.

SHOULD FORTIFY ECONOMY

(d) That meanwhile the American nations should do that which is in their power to fortify their economy, to augment their commerce and economic relations among each other, to project and apply adequate methods to solve difficulties, disadvantages, and dangers that derive from the existing perturbation and dislocation in current conditions.

(e) That the American nations consider it necessary to maintain their normal economic links existing among themselves in order to assure conservation or betterment of the position acquired among their respective markets.

2. To amplify and intensify the activities of the Inter-American Economic and Financial Consultative Committee so that this organism may continue consultations among the American Republics in relation to economic and commercial matters and adjustments, especially contemplating the immediate situations which it is necessary to confront as a result of constriction of important farm markets and exchanges operated in this respect.

With the object of solving special problems, subcommittees composed of representatives of the interested countries may be constituted in those places thought to be most suited to their better functioning.

3. Especially to charge said committee in the shortest possible time to proceed to:

TO CARE FOR SURPLUSES

(a) Cooperate with each country on this continent in a study of the possible measures for the increase of internal consumption of its own export surpluses of those fundamental products of the economic life of the same.

(b) Propose to the American nations immediate measures and adjustments based on mutual benefit which tend to increase the interchange among the same, avoiding that with these the interests of respective producers shall be hurt and having as an objective the amplification of markets for such products and the augmentation of their consumption.

(c) Create instruments of inter-American cooperation for warehousing, financing, and transitory disposition of the surpluses of said products, as well as for their orderly and systematic distribution and sale, taking into account normal conditions of production and distribution of these products.

(d) Propose the celebration of agreements concerning said products with the aim to assure, as much for the producers as for consumers, equitable conditions of interchange.

(e) Recommend methods to raise the level of life of the peoples of America, including measures for public health and good nutrition.

FOR HUMANITARIAN AID

(f) Establish appropriate organisms for the distribution of a part of the surplus of any of said products as a humanitarian measure and social aid.

(g) Consider, while these plans and recourses are being developed, the establishment of a broader system of inter-American cooperation in matters relating to measures of credit and other aids which might be immediately necessary in economic, financial, and monetary matters and in foreign exchange.

4. Support Resolution 13 of the Inter-American Economic Financial Consultative Committee and recommend for the promotion of the economic development of the American nations under the terms of said resolution, that each one of them, by self-initiative, establish in consonance with the program of the Inter-American Development Commission enterprises of government or private capital coming from two or more republics in this hemisphere.

These enterprises may direct themselves directly to the Inter-American Bank or to other official or private credit institutions, recommending that the bank referred to shall grant the most favorable consideration to the possibility of lending them financial aid.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN].

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to take these 5 minutes to tell the House my personal views in regard to the corn-sealing program. It is not my intention to say anything about the cotton part of this bill because that subject has been covered very fully by other gentlemen speaking here today.

It is my firm conviction from the knowledge obtained from farming for years before coming to Congress that the average farmer in the Seventh District of Minnesota, one of the best farming regions to be found anywhere on this earth, did not make any profit from 1931 to 1939 with the exception possibly of the last 3 years. We were afflicted by drought for 2 years, following the disastrous year of 1932. I am also personally convinced that had it not been for the corn loans that those 3 years—1937, 1938, and 1939—would not have shown a profit to the farmers of the great Midwest. That is why today I am urging you men and women to vote for this bill.

Had the farmers in my congressional district in Minnesota been forced to sell the excess corn that they had for marketing during those 3 years they would have received anywhere from 30 cents per bushel up to 39 cents per bushel at husking time; that is, providing that the price had held to where it was and not allowing for the great stabilizing effect of the corn loans on the market.

In other words, the average quarter-section farmer in southwestern Minnesota who might happen to have had 2,000 bushels of corn to sell, either as corn or through feeding it to livestock, would, at the very most, have received an average of approximately 35 cents per bushel from that same 2,000 bushels of corn per year for those 3 years. This means that he would have to take at least 20 cents per bushel less, or $400 less, for the same 2,000 bushels of corn each year had he not been able to apply for the Commodity Credit loan of 57 cents per bushel.

But there is still a more grave angle to this situation than the mere difference between the 35-cent average market price per bushel and the 57-cent loan rate. Without doubt, had it not been that a floor of 57 cents per bushel, a prop holding up the market price, had been placed as it was under this corn, my friends and Members of this Congress, you would most likely have seen a reenactment, if not worse, of the agricultural slump of the year 1932.

Had it been left to the speculators in Chicago to dictate what price the farmer should receive for that corn the past 3 years, I sincerely doubt whether we would have been able to obtain more than 20 cents per bushel. Yes; there is considerable doubt whether or not that same quarter-section farmer with the 2,000 bushels of corn that he had for sale would have received the total of $400 for it rather than the approximately $1,200 that he actually obtained under the loan through the Commodity Credit Corporation.

We have an emergency in agriculture and have had one for years. I know from personal experience, from actual experience back in the district which I have the honor to represent here in the House, that the farmers of my congressional district—and I can safely say that applies to all agriculture in America—cannot continue to farm under cost of production and also retain ownership of their farms. I repeat that if we are ever to expect the tenant farmer to be given an opportunity to own his own farm, that can never be attained by refusing to pay the farmer what it costs him to produce the food which the rest of the Nation must have or cease to exist.

Today, in these few minutes, I cannot go into the reasons for the present pitiful condition of agricultural prices. There is no doubt, however, that the flooding of our own American markets by the products produced in foreign countries have had much to do with costing the farmers of America billions of dollars in gross income. There is no doubt in my mind that the American farmers cannot compete with the low-priced labor of other countries for the world market and for our own market and still maintain a decent standard, the American standard of living, here in America.

I sincerely hope that in a few years at the most that we shall be able to receive cost of production for what we produce on the farm, for that portion which is consumed in our Nation, just as the automobile manufacturer is given cost of production on his automobile; just as the steel manufacturer is assured of so much per ton on the steel manufactured; and just as the laboring man who works in factories which produce products sold in interstate commerce is given and guaranteed a certain minimum wage for his labor. Surely, when because of the upset economic system in our country, a farmer is not able to obtain a decent price for his commodities, there is just as much justice in our Government in loaning me as a farmer 57 cents per bushel, only three-quarters of parity, for the corn that I produce and that these quarter-section farmers produce, especially after they have taken at least one-quarter of their corn land out of production; I repeat that there is just as much justice in making such a loan as there is for the Government, for your and my Government, in the vast appropriations made recently for national defense, which we all realize to be necessary, to guarantee to the munition makers, to big business, to airplane manufacturers, from 8- to 12-percent profit before their factories ever start a lick of work on the contract.

I cannot and will not agree that any $500,000,000 has been lost in this program. We sold our 1937 corn just a few weeks ago. The government received for that corn that we delivered in Tyler in the neighborhood of 47 cents per bushel. They loaned us 57 cents per bushel on it, as they have loaned to millions of farmers throughout America. Possibly there might be a 15-percent loss, Mr. Speaker, on the corn part of the program, but I cannot see but what it is far better for our Government to take a loss if necessary of a few hundred millions in a successful effort to hold up the price of these farm commodities rather than to let it go to the dogs, where it would have gone without this loan holding it up. I repeat to you, the farmers back in my district would have sold their corn for 18 or 20 cents per bushel or perhaps less during the last 3 years, let alone what price to which hogs and beef cattle would have fallen, if there had not been the great stabilizing influence of the 57-cent corn loan holding up the price on this great commodity. That 57 cents was under there as a floor. Even that 57 cents does not represent parity, nor does it give to the farmers of America very little if any profit, but what little profit there was went to him rather than to the speculators in Chicago, where otherwise the great corn crops of the last few years would have been dumped on a glutted market.

So, Mr. Chairman, I would not be properly representing the people of the Seventh District of Minnesota, both the farmers and the people in the villages, who are dependent upon the farms of my district for their business, were I to sit back and listen to this debate without taking a small part in it. May I impress upon you that what I have to say in this connection here is the viewpoint of a man who knows what it means to farm actually and not on paper. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to subscribe at the outset to the theory advanced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] when he suggests that instead of providing for the exportation of the raw material to foreign countries we should first process the material and then, if necessary to subsidize, subsidize the finished product. I subscribe to this theory because I think it this way we would be able to give increased employment in our own country and we would be able to store the finished product just as easily as the raw material, and there is no reason why we should not be able to dispose of the finished product as easily as the raw materials.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not true that the Surplus Commodities Corporation now is subsidizing the use of cotton and these other surplus commodities of the farm after they have been processed? Is not that a step in that direction at this time?

Mr. HARE. There is no doubt about that. The Commodity Credit Corporation found last year that it was just as expedient and wise to subsidize the finished product as the raw material because at one time in the year they stopped exporting raw cotton but continued the exportation of the finished product.

A great deal has been said in this debate about the cotton program destroying our export market. The gentleman from Michigan referred to the fact that 2 years ago we exported only 3,000,000 bales. That was true, but one swallow does not make a summer. You cannot judge a program or a plan or a policy by the operations of 1 year.

This past year we exported six and a half million bales, which was about a normal year of exports. If we take a period of 30 years, we will find that the percentage of exports over 5-year periods have all been practically the same ratio with reference to production. That is, when production increases the percentage of exports increases correspondingly, and vice versa. You cannot judge by 1 year. You cannot pick out one year and compare it with another year. You have to take periods of years. For instance, I find from the year 1910 to 1914, a period of 5 years, the percentage of production exported was 65 percent. In the 5-year period 1915 to 1919, inclusive, the percentage of exports compared with production was 50 percent. Then in 1921 to 1925 the percentage of exports compared with production was 58 percent. During the period 1926 to 1930 exports of cotton was 57 percent of production, and the percentage of production exported in the period from 1932 to 1936, inclusive, was 58 percent. In other words, for the past 15 years the percentage of exports of cotton has been practically 58 percent of production.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. FULMER. In connection with that, if you will look at the record you will find that while they have been increasing the production of cotton in foreign countries they have each year been increasing the consumption of additional cotton while in this country we have gone along on practically a level basis so far as the consumption of cotton is concerned.

Mr. HARE. The theory advocated here is not so very different from the theory that has been advocated for a number of years by industry. Industry has for many years clamored for a high protective tariff. That is, industry has been asking the Government to permit industry to tax consumers on everything they buy in an amount equivalent to the tariff duty. In other words they have been asking the Government to tax the people in order to keep foreign goods out of this country. The only difference I see in the theory referred to and the bill before us is to tax all the people, the manufacturer and consumer alike, in order to dispose of American-made goods in foreign countries. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I sat through the hearings on this bill, and when the hearings closed there were questions in my mind that I could not seem to secure an adequate answer to from the witnesses who appeared before the committee. I am going to raise those same questions here this afternoon, in the hope that some members of the committee, or some proponents of this legislation who understand its background and its purpose better than I, will try to answer.

I think the truest words said during the debate this afternoon were the words of the gentleman from South Carolina when he said that until we solve the problem of the cotton farmer we are going to have trouble in every other part of the country. Certainly that is a major problem, and we are not going to have a prosperous United States if the great Southern States are permitted to suffer by lack of an adequate market for their crops. I do not know what the answer to the problem is. Not having any solution, I suppose I shall vote to continue this program.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. FULMER. May I say to the gentleman that to solve this problem we will have to definitely make up our mind that we are going to consume more cotton in this country or else cut the acreage and production of cotton? May I state that in other countries they are mixing other fibers with their cotton, but in this country the various other fibers are running away with our market and cotton is going down. We may have to do something about consuming cotton along that line.

Mr. MILLER. I certainly hope some larger and better market can be found for our cotton crop and for some of our other surpluses.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Let us take this as an illustration. We know that an 11-cent loan is being considered this very minute. If we make the 11-cent loan on cotton at the present time with our European markets in the condition they are, it will encourage the substitution of other fibers for fabrics instead of the use of our domestically produced cotton. We have been running along that road for 10 years and we continue on that road. I want to make that observation to fit in with this very thing the gentleman now states.

Mr. MILLER. I think it is certainly a major part of the problem. I asked Mr. Robbins certain question and I have been searching for an answer. I cannot understand why the world conditions that we face today are greatly different from the conditions that we faced in 1916 and 1917. I believe there is going to be somewhat of a world famine during this coming winter. Certainly a great part of the farm production of Europe will not be harvested this year. A good many of their crops last year were not harvested. I cannot see why we will not have a repetition of World War conditions when there was definitely a shortage of practically all farm commodities. I think that a need for those commodities will exist on the other side of the ocean and, as I see it, our problem is to work out some way to get the surpluses that we have over here, largely cotton, wheat, and corn, to the part of the world where they can use them.

Reference has been made today to the situation of the tobacco farmers. We raise a good deal of tobacco in Connecticut, although most of it, practically all of it, is cigar-wrapper tobacco and is not involved in the present difficulty with British exports. I believe that the only reason that Great Britain is not buying our tobacco, and the reason why it has canceled contracts it had to buy our tobacco and to buy our apples and other farm commodities, is simply that they are now putting every bit of dollar credit they have into war munitions.

I do not believe in driving a hard bargain with anybody because we are in the driver's seat, but I do think we have the interest of our own farmers and our own people to consider, and I can see no reason why we should not insist that, if we are going to sell to the countries of Europe the war materials they badly need and that they apparently have plenty of money to pay for, a certain sum of money be spent on buying these farm surpluses that are today being bought from other countries where they can get normal credit.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I believe the gentleman is making a very interesting statement. I should like to point out that at the present time our inability to sell our surplus goods overseas is, I believe, due to the fact that our ships are unable to go into the belligerent zones and the ships of Great Britain, for example, are busily engaged in carrying men and ammunition up to the hilt. I do believe the time will come, however, when hostilities cease, when we shall be able to get rid of our surpluses and there will be a fine market overseas.

Mr. MILLER. I believe the gentleman agrees that there are bound to be famine conditions in Europe this coming year?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I do agree with that.

Mr. MILLER. It is a coincidence that this bill carries an authorization of an appropriation of $500,000,000, and we know that within the next few days we will have another bill before us also involving $500,000,000. I am wondering if these two bills will not be in conflict and if the result we are trying to reach from passing this bill will not be adversely affected by the other bill when it comes along. As I understand, we are going to be asked to appropriate $500,000,000, as the newspapers have expressed it, to buy the surpluses of South America, to keep those surpluses out of the hands of the European dictators. We all know that many of the surpluses, in fact, most of the surpluses, of South America are also our surpluses. I believe we should consider both of these things at the same time.

While it is not particularly connected with this bill, I think all these matters that are under consideration by the Congress and by the State Department are involved in this whole question of farm surpluses. Again depending only on the newspapers, apparently we are entering into an agreement—maybe it is not a treaty but it certainly is an agreement—that it seems to me at least gives to two-thirds of the republics of this hemisphere the right not only to control our actions but actually, as I see it, to involve us in war. If the newspapers are properly presenting the matter, any two-thirds of the South American nations can practically force us into a position that will put us into a war, whether or not we want to go into it.

I wish that the hearings we have on these matters would be permitted to run longer, and then we could get more of the background and more of the details of these bills. Year after year—and this is not partisan criticism—we have been following the same road, as the gentleman from Michigan pointed out, appropriating money. We know that something has to be done for the farmer. We know that he cannot carry his own surpluses. Still, after 4 or 5 years on one plan, it seems that if it does not work—and it has not worked—there are brains enough in this Congress and in this country to work out a plan that will work and that will restore some fair market to our farmers. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I do not know so very much about cotton but I do know something about corn. Last year I raised corn, as we always do in Iowa, and I sold some of it for 37½ cents a bushel. True, it was a very small amount. I warehoused, sealed, and stored on the farm all I could at 57 cents a bushel under the provisions of the Commodity Credit Act, but I did not have storage room for all of the crop, and so I sold part of it at 37½ cents. This is less than half the cost of production, and also less than about half the parity price.

Let me say to the gentlemen on both sides of this aisle that the farmers cannot live in Iowa and sell corn at 37½ cents a bushel. The amount I sold was only 300 bushels. The rest of it was warehoused and stored at 57 cents. I was home in Iowa last week and I found that corn out there now is selling for about 52 or 54 cents, just such corn as I sold at 37½ cents, and just such corn as was taken over by the Commodity Credit Corporation. The difference between 37 and 57 cents, or 20 cents, used to go to the speculator. The farmer would haul his corn downtown when he husked it and take 37 cents or less per bushel. As the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN] said, if it had not been for this warehousing proposition, we would probably have had to take 20 cents per bushel last fall. Why allow the speculator to get this enormous profit? Why permit the poor farmer to lose the price of his labor?

Today the Government loses practically nothing on corn, and it has lost nothing up to this year. So far the price has raised up to the storing or warehousing price at which the farmers are getting loans from the C. C. C.; but out on the farms the price for the moment may be a trifle less than loan price in some communities. Are you going to vote for the farmer or for the speculator? There was a speech put into the RECORD not long ago by our good friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the watchdog of the Treasury, attempting to show that corn prices had already reached parity. How ridiculous that is when you know what corn is selling for in Iowa. I have my account book over in my office now. If I had known this discussion was coming on, I would have brought it here and would have read the entry about the sale of that corn.

Gentlemen tell me on this side and on the other side, that we must not allow subsidies to the farmer, and that we must refer back to basic principles. Now this would be all right if nobody else was getting subsidies and artificial law-made benefits, but when everybody else is getting subsidies, why not the farmers? I want to emphasize the fact that farmers will live if there are no subsidies to anybody. They will get along somehow, if nobody gets help from the Government. They would not starve to death even if they did not get benefit payments provided that there was no tariff and farmers were allowed to buy in the great world markets, if there was no wage and hour bill, which increases the price of everything farmers buy, if there were no subsidies for mail, for air carriage, or for water transportation, no fair-trade bill which raises prices, no gold subsidy which raises the price of gold to $35 per ounce, if there was no silver purchase price policy which raises the price of silver four times its market value, if railroads got no subsidies, if bankers got no special benefits. I can name a score of such benefits to a score of industries and groups. The farmer is bound to eat and live whether you boys and girls in the cities live or not; but he may be compelled to live without the things that he should have unless he be given fair treatment. Remove all subsidies or else give the farmer his right to receive fair living prices by this loan proposition. The loan proposal was first introduced into this country in Iowa. I had a part in writing it and in making it the law of that State. The idea was then brought here to Washington by the Secretary of Agriculture. In our Republican platform adopted at Philadelphia we said we favored a profit price for agriculture. Are you Republicans on this side going to repudiate that statement and admit that it is a mere platitude and that you will regard the promise as a false and fraudulent one.

Commodity loans have been endorsed by and in the Republican platform, and this is a year in which the Republican Party must carry the great agricultural States of the Middle West. It must carry Iowa and Illinois and other States like them. And you cannot do this if you are false to our promises. This very day there was laid upon your desk the midmonthly local marketing price report of the Agricultural Marketing Service. People generally agree that the years from 1909 to 1914 were average years and that these years were prosperous years for everybody, including the farmer. And these years have been taken as the basis for parity prices. Let me call to your attention also that these years were Republican years. A Republican sat in the White House and the Congress was for the most part Republican. Most agricultural experts agree that these years should be taken as representative years because prosperity came to everybody as a whole.

Using 100 percent as an index number for these years we find from this report that grain was selling in July 1940 for only 78 percent of what it sold for in those prosperous or index years. And we also find that the prices paid by farmers in 1940 was 127 percent of what it was in the former basic years. Here is a difference in the comparison of 49 percent against the interests of the grain farmer. We also find from this report that the ratio of prices received by the farmer to the prices paid by him in July 1940 was only 78 percent of what it should be and what it was formerly in those basic years. Does any gentleman on this floor believe that farmers can exist under such a disparity of price? Does any gentleman believe that he ought of right to live under such disparity of price? Why should a farmer not have parity? Do you think that he ought not to be on a par with other people? If you do, vote against this bill, but do not thereafter pat the farmer on the back and tell him how much you love him, for he will know that you are a fraud and that the truth is not in you.

The present program may not be regarded as a permanent one, but until and unless something else is offered which will keep par and which will redeem pledges and which will be morally fair and which will do equity we must go ahead with it. When Members talking against the bill this afternoon were challenged to propose something else and something better for farmers, these Members very gracefully diverted the argument and slid out from under answering it.

If plans can be devised which will adequately safeguard farm interests in a permanent way. I will be glad to support them, but there is nothing before us of this character this afternoon. The present program depends upon annual appropriations and I can visualize the time when these appropriations will not be made, but we can then substitute other means to do justice to farm people.

We have been voting billions and billions of dollars for defense. We are going to have an army with a huge complement of men sufficient to protect our homes. We are going to implement them with modern arms and munitions. We will build a great navy to protect both our shores. We will have war planes in the air. We will put an argosy upon the waves.

We will have submarines under the waters, and our flag will wave triumphantly over the surface of the land. But let me tell you that there is no defense and that there can be no defense unless agriculture is encouraged to produce foods and fibers and oils that will support armies and navies. Everybody knows that armies travel upon their bellies. Everybody knows that starvation is the means by which dictators and tyrants bring governments and peoples to their knees in suppliance. All the great marshals knew this. Napoleon knew it, and war strategy of the present day is based upon it. The quartermaster is the man who brings victory to armies. And while we are appropriating these moneys for armed defense, I pray that you remember that the production of food is more important than anything else, and that farmers will not and should not be expected to go on producing at a time when they are brought into despair by bankrupt prices for their commodities.

I spoke a moment ago about subsidies and artificial benefits that were going into other than farm channels. Manufacturers get them; industrialists get them; banks get them; carriers get them. Farmers pay for them, and they ought to be exempted from these payments or else they should be given a share of them. It is all right to speak of great principles. It is all right to say the Government should not support the people but that the people should support the Government. But certain entrenched classes have so long been receiving artificial help that they do not realize the truth of the situation. Are you going to say that a farmer should not be on a par with others; that he should be a mere underling; that he should be servile; that he should not have a profit price or a living price for his commodities? Do you believe that when the time comes to quit a spending program, as my friend from Michigan said, someone would bleed blood? All right; will it be the farmer? Are you going to say, "You farmers must be the fellows that bleed this blood"? [Applause.]

I have secured permission to put into the RECORD an editorial which I approve, and which was written by Mr. Waymack, editor of the Des Moines Register, one of the great newspapers of my State, and is as follows:

MORAL PARITY IN USE OF "PRINCIPLES"

Listening to some serious arguments among educated people the other day, we were struck by the way they used great principles to provide foundations for arguments.

Because we think the way they did it is about the way most people do it, we'll describe the procedure.

It was a good deal like the way old-time printers used to reach up into a certain little box to draw out the letter "A," use it, and then put it back for use at some future time.

The old-time printer drew out the letter "A" when the letter "A" was the one he wanted at that particular moment.

When it was the letter "B" he could use to advantage, that was the one he took.

Well, at this discussion that we are speaking of, the agriculture problem was the subject. And one of the very sincere and ardent arguers reached up into the boxes of great principles that he keeps mentally handy, and pulled out the one about the "disastrousness" of people getting into the habit of "leaning" on government.

Now, this is an all-right principle. That is to say, there's something to it. Something real and big and important.

It is true that if all the people come to look to government for everything, and to quit relying at all on themselves, the country gets in a bad way.

But the trouble about plucking out this great principle and applying it with gusto to the farm problem is that those who are so fond of doing this put the principle promptly away again, and exhibit another more suitable for their purpose, the moment they start arguing about any other problem except the farm.

Sometimes, if the discussion swings rapidly from one subject to another, the finger work of the pluckers-out of great principles becomes something marvelous to behold.

It is as magnificent an exhibition of speed and dexterity as when Paderewski does a swift piece with miraculously nimble hands over the keyboard of a piano.

Only it doesn't make harmony, intellectual harmony.

Invariably, when an arguer proposes the great principle of never leaning on government as a final and complete damnation of every approach to agriculture's problem that stands any chance of getting anywhere, this arguer obviously assumes, at least for the moment, that never until agriculture began to assert its rights was any leaning done.

He invariably ignores the fact that it is governmental policies, demanded and got by earlier leaners, that have created the farm problem.

He doesn't really argue against all leaning. He argues in favor of all leaning that has been done up to a certain point and against all leaning from that point on.

He preaches unqualified reliance on rugged individualism and unimpeded economic law for the farmers, but for none other.

And the moment anyone tries to make him apply his great principle of nonleaning to everybody, not just to the farmers, he stuffs it back in its little box so fast it makes your head swim.

Perhaps the great need of this country is not, as Tom Marshall said, back in the quiet McKinley days, "a good 5-cent cigar," but a United States committee on the coordination of the argumentative use of great principles.

Until that committee gets its job done, which we surmise will be when the millennium comes, we are just going to scoff at the one-sided and obtuse gentlemen who can't stomach leaning on government, because it is wrong in principle, when it is the farm cause that is up, though they can't find that principle with a microscope on any other occasion.

Some time ago we raised the question of moral parity as well as economic parity for American agriculture.

Moral parity in the use of great principles is one desperate need.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE].

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, in March, I think it was, of 1938, the Congress passed an act requiring that on March 31 of each year the assets and liabilities of the Commodity Credit Corporation should be appraised. They were appraised last year, 1939, and on the value of the commodities on which the loans had been made as compared with the amount of the loans, it was found that the capital structure had been impaired. It was necessary for the Congress to appropriate funds to correct that impairment. A terrific fight was made on the floor, particularly on the Republican side, against the appropriation of funds to repair the capital stock. I stated then I thought it would be very unfortunate if the Congress should adjourn without appropriating funds for that impairment because then the buyers of cotton, corn, and wheat would know that the Commodity Credit Corporation was helpless, could not make loans and that the buyers would take advantage of the situation. I further stated that I thought if the appropriation was made and the world knew and the cotton buyers knew that the Government was in position to protect the farmers, very little use would be made of the cotton loans.

It appears that this was a correct prediction. We produced last year about 12,000,000 bales of cotton, but of that total crop only 19,849 bales are under loan. That is the amount of cotton of last year's crop that is under loan and the reason it is so little is the fact that we did restore the capital stock and the buyers knew that the Government was in position to protect the farmer and the market price was maintained at above the loan figure. That is exactly what we face at this hour.

There is now only $33,000,000 available for loans. That is all the money the Commodity Credit Corporation has. If you fail to pass this bill, the corn buyers, the wheat buyers, and the cotton buyers will know that the Commodity Credit Corporation is helpless, that there is no money there to make the loans, although there is a law making the loans mandatory, and the chances are that you will have 3- or 4-cent cotton again and 15- or 20-cent corn again and 20- or 30-cent wheat again. That is exactly the situation.

It is estimated that $150,000,000 will be needed for corn loans, 260,000,000 bushels; that $90,000,000 will be needed for wheat, 140,000,000 bushels; that $150,000,000 will be needed for 3,300,000 bales of cotton; $40,000,000 for loans on tobacco, and $60,000,000 for loans on other crops, making a total prospective need of $490,000,000.

This is why those interested in the corn, wheat, cotton, and tobacco producers of this Nation are here asking you to increase the lending power of the Corporation, but hoping that not one dollar of it will have to be used. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN].

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Chairman, when the officials of the Commodity Credit Corporation were asked by the members of the Banking and Currency Committee why they wished this additional half billion dollars, they stated that owing to the tremendous upset in the world conditions it would probably be necessary for the Corporation to make so-called loans to this extent during the next fiscal year. I do not think that the average citizen, outside the districts where these loans are made, realizes that these so-called loans are not loans at all, but that they are made in every case without recourse. The farmer is given the money, either through a bank with the Corporation's guaranty, or through the Corporation itself, at a set price which may be the market value of the crop, or in some cases above the market value. Then, if the price goes up, the farmer is allowed to sell the commodity covered by the loan, while, if the price goes down, the Government is left holding the bag and the farmer is not even asked to pay insurance or interest, as a rule. No matter how many other resources the farmer may have, he has no further responsibility, and owes nothing to the Corporation.

Mr. PACE. Is not the same thing true of the city man with the H. O. L. C. loan and other loans on which there is no security other than the collateral itself?

Mr. KEAN. No; I do not think that is true of the H. O. L. C. One of the complaints of the H. O. L. C. is that they are always taking deficiency judgments.

Mr. PACE. I understood that they could not take deficiency judgments.

Mr. KEAN. Oh, yes; they can. I am not saying that this policy, in the conditions which have confronted the world in the last few years, is not advisable. I cannot qualify as an expert on farm conditions, but I do say that in calling this sort of deal a loan, the average person is being deceived with reference to this whole policy. What the policy should be called is an underwriting and a guaranteeing of a minimum price to farmers on certain commodities, and the public in considering whether this policy should be further expanded, should understand this fact clearly.

As I said before, I am not qualified to judge the necessity for this program or the need for the increase at the present moment, but I cannot stand here and favor increasing the guaranteed debt of the United States by another half billion dollars. In the bill which we passed the other day we increased the regular debt limit by $3,000,000,000 to take care of conditions arising out of the emergency created by events abroad. If the Commodity Credit Corporation needs this money, it should be secured by selling Treasury bonds. It is about time that we stopped issuing these Government-guaranteed obligations in an attempt to fool the people as to how much money the Government really owes. This bill, taken in conjunction with the bill we passed a while ago turning certain capital back to the Treasury and thereby decreasing the direct Treasury obligations in exchange for increasing the guaranteed obligations, will raise the guaranteed debt to well over $6,000,000,000, which will make our total debt $55,000,000,000. Of course, the excuse is made that many of the guaranteed bonds are secured by assets which may be recoverable, but certainly no banker would consider a so-called loan up to the full market price on a commodity which fluctuates violently in price, and on which there is no recourse against the borrower, as a safe risk. How long are we going to continue guaranteeing these questionable obligations? I think it is about time that we stopped fooling ourselves as to the amount that we owe.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEAN. Yes.

Mr. THORKELSON. Is it not a fact that the farm imports today are in a sense a subsidy to the foreign farmers? I refer to the farm imports brought about by the trade treaties and compacts, the imports of cattle and wheat. Is it not a fact that the loans that we extend to foreign nations are a double subsidy for the foreign farmers at the expense of our own, and in order to adjust that that we must subsidize our own producers?

Mr. KEAN. It may be true that the policy which the administration wants to carry out with reference to South America, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] said, is to lend money to South America to help their crops, and then we will have to pay our own farmers extra money for the crops here. It seems rather illogical.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEAN. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think it is necessary, in studying this information obtained from the State Department, to realize that this country has been committed to the proposition of making common cause with the 20 countries to the south of us. We are now in the pot with them, and, in my opinion, it will tie up all of the surplus products of these 20 countries to the south of us. And if our distinguished Chairman will permit me to make this observation, I refer to one of his press reports issued the other day, where he had reference to the Export-Import Bank bill which will be up for consideration, I suppose, within a few days. He said this:

> As part of a broader program of this country with the other countries of the Western Hemisphere, I have today introduced a bill which will broaden the lending powers of the Export-Import Bank and enable it to make loans for the purpose of assisting in the development of the resources, the stabilization of the economies, and the orderly marketing of the products of such countries.

That, in connection with the economic declaration of the 21 countries, in my opinion, sews us up positively and definitely to whatever billions are required to handle the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, the problem that is attempted to be met in this bill is the problem of so-called surpluses. We know that to a great extent these so-called surpluses are not real surpluses at all. More recently we have developed the stamp plan in the Surplus Commodities Corporation, on the very reasonable idea that the thing to do with food, if there are hungry people in the country, is to enable those people to consume it.

Basically, as America looks forward into her future, the one most vital thing that it seems to me she must realize is this: that her opportunity of living at peace is going to depend in very large measure on her ability in developing a distributive system which will enable her people to consume as they produce. I say this because it appears to me inevitable that opportunity for foreign trade is going to be much less in future than it has been in the past. There are some commodities which we produce in real surplus—some commodities where we are dependent upon foreign markets to dispose of them. One of those commodities is cotton. It therefore seems to me to be perfectly ridiculous for people to criticize the present program of the Department of Agriculture which endeavors, through the soil-conservation program, to enable our farmers to get a better balance in the production which takes place.

Now, here is a program of making loans to farmers to enable them to stabilize the market and protect agricultural prices, or to realize a better price on their production. I think it is little enough for us to do this. Our farmers—25 percent of our population—have received over a long period of time no more than 6 percent to 11 percent of the Nation's income. But I have asked for this time in order to say that I believe that fundamentally what this problem is is a problem of coming much nearer than we have ever come before to enabling the American people to consume their production. Doing that, believe me, has more to do than any other one thing with our hope of peace and our true national defense.

Now, here is wealth already produced. Here are people in need of those farm commodities, and yet it is, we think, necessary for us in the first place to borrow some of our own national credit to loan the farmers and then to borrow some more in order to finance the stamp plan. It does not seem to me that is reasonable, particularly not when the level of prices for basic farm commodities is below what it ought to be, and particularly not when you know that the prices of those commodities will respond to the influence of the injection of an additional quantity of the medium of exchange into circulation quicker than any prices that there are. It seems to me that we have a duty to directly monetize these commodities which are already produced and waiting for a market and thus enable the people of America to consume them promptly. I think such a policy should be continued until such time as agricultural prices are restored to parity.

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to my distinguished and able friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. JOHNS. I have been interested in the discussions about the floor of prices for agricultural products. It seems to me that if this bill were carried to its logical conclusion and you made loans to every farmer on every product in this country and fixed the loan, such as was spoken about this morning, at, say, 57 cents, and the Government absorbed the difference, we would not have any trouble in working out our floor of prices. The Government would pay that much anyway. What does the gentleman think about that? The gentleman is a great economist and I would like to have the gentleman answer that.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I have been one Member who has been very deeply interested for a long time in the general approach to the agricultural problem, of a guaranteed minimum price for agricultural products. I have thought and studied at length on this subject and always I come back to the idea of saying in a careful piece of legislation that below a certain price farm commodities will not be allowed to fall. I recognize that such a plan involves certain difficulties, certain difficulties that will have to be met and overcome in some fashion, but I will say this much: Either every monopoly in America which levies tribute upon the rest of the people in the form of artificially high prices must have its power broken or else the farmer must be protected against cutthroat competition and control of his prices by agencies like the Chicago Board of Trade. In the interest of national defense on yesterday we provided for a minimum profit of 12 percent on airplane contracts. I do not know of anything more fundamental than food products, from the standpoint of national defense, and it appears to me that if you are going to take steps like that in one field, there is quite as much logic in taking them in another. The burden of my present appeal is this, however, that we understand that a so-called surplus is not a real surplus so long as there are people in the United States who need to use it; and that wealth produced is the only basis that gives money value; that, therefore, there is a gap in our thinking in this respect unless we know how to bring those two things together. [Applause.]

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I wonder if the gentleman noticed in the testimony given in the hearings that there was no particular concern with corn and no losses on the food commodities; it was only on the cotton. The problem for consumption is purely cotton. I am not sure what the figures are. Perhaps the gentleman knows about the chances for increasing the consumption of cotton in our country.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I think there are ways to do that. I would point out that we are only beginning at this moment to utilize the stamp plan of the Surplus Commodities Corporation for cotton. It is being used in my own county in California, and I am very interested to see what the consequence of that will be. My own conception of that plan is that it is only a very good beginning in the sort of thing we need to do. I tried to say awhile ago that we all realize that in the case of cotton there is a real problem; a problem that is more difficult than the problem connected with any other commodity. I might say, however, that cotton surpluses would be sharply reduced if all the families in this Nation had sufficient buying power to buy mattresses and sheets and things like that which most of us regard as necessities.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. The gentleman realizes they are making these loans on 30 or 40 commodities. The testimony shows that the Government has not lost a dime on cotton in the past 2 years. The testimony further shows that the Chairman of the Board said that as long as you limit the loans to 50 or 60 percent of parity he does not believe you will lose a dime on cotton.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Well, I hope the gentleman did not understand me to be critical of that program. I am not at all. I have simply been trying to interject some consideration of more basic matters.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. But the lady from Illinois brought up that subject. I wanted to assure her there has been no loss on cotton in the past 2 years.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. There is one more thing I want to say about agriculture and national defense. It is the sort of thing to which we are giving entirely too little thought. The more people any nation has who can say to themselves that they own a small piece of their native land, the stronger that nation will be. Conversely, to the extent that numbers of our people are forced off their land onto the road or pushed back into the group of tenants, we are weakened to that extent—at least in spirit. And the spirit of our people, believe me, gentlemen, is important. Do you know that we have in excess of $1,000,000,000 lying idle in our Treasury which could be used with perfect safety for making loans to enable tenants and former farm owners, who are now migrant laborers, to become owners? I have introduced a bill that would make that possible; and may I say that it would be well if some legislation of that kind could receive some earnest consideration—yes; right now. For, after all, the defense of our country in the last analysis is in the hearts of its people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made today.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the remarks I made today I ask unanimous consent to include an editorial.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair informs the gentleman from Iowa that he will have to obtain that permission in the House.

All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved March 8, 1938 (52 Stat. 107), as amended by the act approved March 4, 1939 (53 Stat. 510), be amended as follows: In section 4, delete the figure "$900,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "$1,400,000,000".

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin: Page 1, line 7, strike out "$1,400,000,000" and insert "$1,000,000,000."

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, our national debt is increasing at a very rapid and dangerous rate. Any thinking person who studies government and the history of the governments of the world will realize that the real danger to our common country at this very hour lies within and not without. Every country which has had a dictatorship supplant its previous form of government has carried on a spending spree on borrowed public money as has the New Deal in the United States for 7 long years.

Mr. Chairman, here we have a bill to increase our national debt $500,000,000 for so-called cotton and corn relief. In a few days we expect to consider a bill which requires Uncle Sam to borrow and spend another $500,000,000 from our almost bankrupt Federal Treasury. This latter bill will hand $500,000,000 to South American dictator countries which now owe our private American investors more than $2,000,000,000 and are now in default in principal and interest payments on most of this debt.

Mr. Chairman, we will be asked to hand these South American dictatorships $500,000,000 so that they can produce more of the very products which are produced in America and for which the $500,000,000 in the pending bill is to be expended.

Mr. Chairman, with reference to cotton, we know that since the New Deal has had control of our Federal Government the export market for United States cotton has decreased millions of bales per year. At the same time South America, particularly Brazil, has increased its cotton exports many times. Now Mr. Hull, the New Deal Secretary of State, comes along and asks that we raid our almost bankrupt Federal Treasury and hand half a billion dollars to South American dictatorships in order that they can produce more cotton, corn, and other agricultural products which compete with the products of our country.

Mr. Chairman, should we continue these New Deal expenditures and American sell-out policies much longer, Uncle Sam will be plunged into bankruptcy and inflation, which will bring our people misery, distress, suffering, despair, and chaos such as we have never known.

Mr. Chairman, instead of having the Federal Government borrow half a billion dollars to subsidize foreign competitors and another half a billion under the pending bill for the relief of those producing the very same commodities in the United States, we should levy a substantial tariff tax on all competitive foreign imports in order to increase tax revenues and decrease tax burdens of our own people. Charity begins at home. In the interest of our country and our countrymen, our New Deal brethren should stop borrowing billions of dollars with which to play Santa Claus to foreign countries and foreign people, as they have been doing for 7 long years. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. RICH. I will strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman. I think that the amendment is probably a very wise amendment to have incorporated into this particular bill now under discussion.

This bill carries with it as it now stands $500,000,000. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin would cut it down to $100,000,000. Even if we appropriate the $100,000,000, I ask the Members on the Democratic side of the House: Where are you going to get the money? I have been asking you that for 6 years and you have not found the answer. You never can and you never will be able to. It will take a wise Congress to do so.

Yesterday you appropriated $4,800,000,000 in cash and authorizations when there was less than a majority of the Members present on the floor. About 100 Members are present on the floor this afternoon, and today it is $500,000,000 more. Let me show you just what we have appropriated during this session of Congress.

We have appropriated over $12,799,602,760. Here is the list of appropriations:

Regular annual appropriations, 76th Cong., 3d sess.

Agriculture and farm credit		$918,603,918.00
Independent offices		1,120,243,528.00
State	$20,125,500
Commerce	33,908,500
Justice	41,323,000
Judiciary	11,792,000
		107,149,000.00
Treasury	218,752,033
Post Office	814,049,062
		1,032,801,095.00
Navy		1,308,171,138.00
Interior		135,383,330.05
District of Columbia		48,765,080.00
Civil functions		222,718,717.00
Military		1,499,323,322.00
Legislative		23,671,220.00
Labor	$32,714,390
Federal Security	857,143,400
Other	133,424,900
		1,023,282,690.00
Emergency supplemental		252,340,776.00
Urgent deficiency		57,541,300.00
First deficiency		92,035,408.52
Second deficiency		85,891,777.23
Emergency relief		1,157,711,357.00
First supplemental national defense		1,479,777,147.00
Second supplemental national defense (passed House)		2,234,191,957.00

The President's estimate of the income for the year 1941 was $5,600,000,000. You brought in a tax bill several weeks ago to raise $1,007,000,000. I say to you that you should bring in two or three more tax bills such as that, because it is going to be necessary at least to keep the deficit down next year to where it is this year. I have insisted on new taxes or less spending for 7 years, because with the appropriations you have made compared with the small revenue you will receive, you will be in the red next year $6,192,602,760.

That is not the nigger in the woodpile, large as that deficit is. The nigger in the woodpile lies in the authorizations you have made this session, authorizations so large in amount they will stagger the next Congress to meet when it comes into session. There is the nigger in the woodpile. It will stagger the imagination of the greatest financiers in America to face the deficit you have made and the obligations you have created. You have been in the red every year since the New Deal came to town from one and one-half billions to four and one-half billions annually. A shame, a disgrace. In the next session of Congress it will require men who have the greatest possible business heads on them, men who are the greatest possible executives of all time, to master the situation which you have gotten America into. America is facing a terrible catastrophe. Notwithstanding the fact that the statement has been made that we are in a national emergency, I have been unable to find any one who can explain to me what this great national emergency is, except fear. Fear is the great national emergency that confronts us. What is the fear of? It is the fear of somebody in a foreign country coming over to this country and attacking us.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in preparedness but if we are going to have preparedness we want to have preparedness not only to take care of the enemies that might approach our shore but we must have preparation to take care of our economic situation and the great debt that you have created in the last 8 years. With the authorizations that have been made during this session of Congress it is going to take the ingenuity and the business ability of the best brains this country can afford to get us over the period which we now face.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield for a question.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Did the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania on yesterday speak against the appropriation bill which was being considered at that time or did he vote against it?

Mr. RICH. Well, I will tell the gentleman, there were not enough red-blooded Members of Congress to stand up here and say that we should not give that much money to the White House to spend at this time. We are for preparedness but not for dictatorship. I am afraid that bill may lead to it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman himself evidently did not have the guts to vote against the bill or to speak against the bill.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman did not have enough red blood in his veins to come here and speak against it and there was not anybody else, but I suppose the gentleman is satisfied with his votes for New Deal spending, but when it comes to national defense, we ought to defend America. But we should not have permitted the terrible squandering of funds unnecessary in Government operation. We could and should have cut down our expenses greatly. Our children will stagger with our national debt. It is a millstone around their neck, a burden they may not be able to bear. I am and have been for economy in Government operation for unnecessary functions established and bureaus set up. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in view of what has been said in reference to the operations of the Commodity Credit Corporation under present management, I think it is only fair to call attention to the fact that after investigation by a Senate committee it was ascertained that the losses in a 2-year period under the Board that conducted similar operations with a limited number of commodities during the Hoover administration amounted to $345,000,000 of the $500,000,000 authorized, or about 69 percent of the loans made.

For the past 6 years of operations of the Commodity Credit Corporation there have been losses of only $25,000,000, and, as has been pointed out by my colleague from Georgia, those losses in the past 2 years did not arise by reason of any transactions in connection with cotton crops.

In order that the House may understand what it is going to vote on, may I say that the pending amendment would reduce the authorization in the present bill from $500,000,000 to $100,000,000. The effect would be to destroy the purpose of the bill and to nullify the efforts of the Corporation to support the orderly marketing of the crops of 1940. The sums that will be required, according to estimate, amount to $150,000,000 for cotton, $150,000,000 for corn, and $90,000,000 for wheat, $40,000,000 for tobacco, and $60,000,000 for other crops. It is manifest and indisputable that to limit the fund to $100,000,000 as against such demands would certainly tie the hands of the corporation and defeat the purpose of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, during the hearings on this bill before the Banking and Currency Committee a question was raised about a statement I made on the floor some time ago with reference to a loss by the Commodity Credit Corporation. It appears that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS], one of the members of the committee, asked a question of Mr. Robbins, president of the Commodity Credit Corporation, whether my statement that $186,000,000 was lost by the Commodity Credit Corporation was correct. He stated he spoke from memory in mentioning that amount. The figure I gave, as a matter of fact, was $180,965,315.

Mr. Robbins' answer indicated my figures were wrong.

The statement I made on the 31st of May and referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS] was that the Treasury of the United States had reported that loss and I gave it as my authority at that time. I wish now to repeat that statement and to state again my authority for the same. It was taken from Document No. 172, Part 1, Financial Statement of Certain Government Agencies by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in response to Senate resolution No. 150. On page 30 of this document, under table 25, appear the figures which show a loss by the Commodity Credit Corporation as of June 30, 1939, of $180,965,315.

Regarding this bill, this is, as I understand, the second or third time the amount, which the Commodity Credit Corporation may lend, has been raised. As long as the present regime continues the amount will be continuously raised, nothing stopping this process but bankruptcy of the Treasury.

The increased authorization for more millions by the Commodity Credit Corporation is merely a part of the general policy now in operation with respect to all the other lending agencies.

Soon we will be confronted with another request to authorize an increase in the lending capacity of the Export-Import Bank of Washington to $500,000,000. This is to be used as a nucleus for more and greater appropriations to embark our Nation upon another wild and devastating program, a cartel which is to be formed to buy up all the surpluses of Argentina, Brazil, and all the other South American countries to keep them from trading with certain European nations. Apparently this cartel idea is to be operated in conjunction with our armed forces.

Much praise is being showered by newspaper editors and others on our State Department for its success in the recent Habana conference. On the surface, it no doubt appears to many that much was accomplished there in bringing the Latin American countries in line with a common defense policy, and probably also with a trading policy that will protect our Nation from undue competition with certain European nations.

However, the people should go a little slow here. It is too early to tell just what was accomplished at Habana. Just how much was each one of the delegates from the other countries influenced by the $500,000,000 that was dangled before their eyes? What part did that play in the final result? Here is something to think about. Anyone familiar with the history of our financial, diplomatic, and military relations with South America well knows it is most probable this $500,000,000 loan proposal to the Latin American countries played an important role in making the Habana agreement possible.

What would happen with that pact should Congress refuse to authorize this $500,000,000 loan?

God alone knows where all this is leading us. Now, when we are in need of strengthening our armed defenses, as well as our internal conditions, when we should be conserving to the utmost all our resources, and especially when we should be bending every effort to strengthen our first line of defense, the financial condition of our Government, we are engaging in just the opposite.

Anyway, this is not really helping the farmers. A bankrupt Treasury will wreck the farmers the same as all other groups. Certainly they realize this. [Applause.]

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said that all a woman has is her good name. I assume that a good reputation for accuracy is important to those who are in Congress, because Members are so often expected to take what is said on faith. The statement I made which was questioned was that there had not been much loss on commodities other than cotton. That statement is substantiated by the testimony given in the hearings as set out on page 10 in answer to a question by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS] a member of the committee, as follows:

Question:

What I had in mind was where has been the loss? Has it been on any particular article or is it general?

And Mr. Robbins, who is the head of the Commodity Credit Corporation, replied:

The loss of the less-than-$25,000,000 that has been incurred to date has been principally on cotton, because that crop came under loan in larger volume as a consequence of its great loss of export outlets.

Those of you who are interested in corn, and by that I mean corn as a commodity grown in your community, will also be interested in the testimony on page 44, in which Mr. Robbins discussed the fact that the reason we have had a surplus on the corn market is that recently we have had three bumper crops in succession, which is unusual. The witness made the following comment:

Even though we should have, let us say, 450,000,000 bushels of corn under loan and 90,000,000 owned, as at the present time, plus whatever free stock might be on hand at the beginning of the next marketing season, the total would be probablly less than one-third of a normal corn crop, so that if a drought should occur—that would reduce yields by a very large amount. All of the corn in the free supply, all that we own, and all that is under loan would be needed as feed for stock.

I draw your attention to this fact for this one reason. I feel that in our part of the country—I know nothing about the cotton situation, personally—these corn loans can be used as a material factor to prevent depressions, for this reason. Our trouble is to get money down into the bottom of the well, in the rural communities. We can do that only at the time the crops are marketed. For instance, from 1932 to 1935 hardly anybody where I lived marketed his corn crop who could avoid selling, and consequently there was little money pump-primed in a natural way down to our communities. Those corn loans have been effective in bringing money down into our communities regularly each year, and I believe that if some steps can be taken to take care of the cotton-surplus problem and the problems where the supply is greater than it should be, this corn-loan plan is a possibility that we should consider, since it creates a healthier economy. We as Republicans have never been loath to consider and study all New Deal proposals, even when they have been suggested by certain new dealers in whose judgment we have learned to feel little confidence.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. If we do not solve the cotton problem by finding an additional export market or reopening a market, the Commodity Credit Corporation will lose between $300,000,000 and $400,000,000 on the cotton they hold.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. In that connection, since the South American question has been brought up today a little prematurely, may I say that I was doing some studying on the South American surplus-commodity problem last week, and I received a rough estimate from a reputable authority whose name I shall not mention because I have not requested permission to use his name. This authority estimated that if we took over the surpluses of South America as they are today, without making any allowances for the surpluses there might be if the South Americans attempted to raise without any crop control—and we would, of course, have nobody to police them—in the next 10 years we would be into a $20,000,000,000 program. Goodness knows what it would cost us if they were tempted to increase their production as such a guaranty of surplus disposal would tempt them to do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Going to the question of cotton and corn, corn is not an export crop as is cotton. A plan of this kind can work quite effectively on corn without piling up these potentialities.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. That is right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But in the case of cotton, we are surrendering the world market to other cotton-producing areas and thereby putting our cotton operators in the South out of a job, or driving them into competition with northern agriculture. In my opinion, therein is the danger. We are making a jacket for both cotton and corn crops which, I believe, is proving to be absolutely unsound.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. In studying South American conditions, I was particularly impressed with the figures, which I do not have at my fingertips at the moment, showing their recent increase in cotton production. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, I have taken this time because the House, when it adjourns today, will probably adjourn over until Monday. Under this particular bill, the Commodity Credit Corporation bill which has to do with our surplus crops, there is a question I want to propose to the Members of Congress on both sides, and ask their consideration of it. There is probably no man in the House who is more opposed than I to intermeddling in the affairs of foreign nations and being involved in the European war situation. There is probably no Member of the House who is more of an isolationist from foreign wars than I. But that does not mean that I am an isolationist from either peace, good will, or humanitarian efforts.

It seems to me that the United States owes a great moral duty toward suffering humanity and has a great moral obligation to the world. We are all thankful because we have been able to keep out of the war, but that does not mean that we are fulfilling our moral obligations to the world. In the next 6 months or in the next year millions of people in Europe, men, women, and children, but particularly women and children, may die of starvation. We have an enormous surplus in wheat, in corn, in hogs, and in cotton. We have been destroying a potential surplus for years, paying the farmers a billion dollars to plow under and destroy our crops and kill off our pigs. It seems to me in this war tragedy that has covered Europe that we, more than any other nation, have a moral duty and obligation to provide relief to the starving and stricken people of Europe. Probably we are the only Nation in the world that can easily feed the starving people of Poland, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, and France. Of course, we must first see that our own people are fed first, but we should take the rest of the surplus and for the time being, not lend it to these war-ravaged foreign nations and to these starving people in Europe, but give to them and not even ask for any thanks. We may not even get any thanks in return, but, nevertheless, instead of plowing under or destroying these crops and instead of hiding them away in storehouses, if these war-stricken foreign nations are unable to buy them we should give our surplus foodstuffs to them without thought of recompense in the name of humanity and from one Christian nation to another to save these war victims—women and children from starving to death. I think every Member of Congress would be glad to consider any sound and constructive program that would enable us to give our surplus corn, wheat, hogs, and beef to the starving children of Europe, and that is what I am asking the Members of Congress to consider regardless of partisanship, because such action will be necessary in the near future. It may come within the next 30 or 60 days when we will be asked to decide that question, and I know in advance what my answer will be.

I would give every pound of pork and beef and every bushel of surplus wheat and corn to these starving women and children who, through no fault of their own, may not be able to live through another winter in Europe. That is our obligation toward the people of war-ridden Europe and that is the American way. That is also the humanitarian way and I believe when Congress is called upon to act it will respond as it did in the Belgian relief, back in 1915, and if it responds in that manner, not one pound of our foodstuffs will go to the German Army, but will all go to help save the lives of millions of Polish, Norwegian, Danish, Dutch, Belgian, and French children.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I want to take this occasion to point out a more serious need which exists in one of our island possessions right at this moment. Puerto Rico has a population of 1,800,000 people and the Associated Press reports today that 100,000 people have been stricken with influenza down there, and of the first 52,000 cases 144 deaths have taken place. This means one person out of every 18 in Puerto Rico has now been stricken with influenza and is subject to a possible case of pneumonia. I submit that is a hardship and a casualty to which the Congress should give its immediate attention and all agencies of the Government should send all of the help that is necessary to relieve the suffering of these people down in Puerto Rico at this time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, we have another important bill coming up at this time and the Members are desirous of getting away and therefore I feel constrained to object at this time, for the additional reason that this is not pertinent to the bill under consideration.

Mr. FISH. It is very pertinent but I shall discuss it later on.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, may we have the pending amendment again reported?

The Clerk again read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin) there were—ayes 51, noes 79.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIMMERMAN: At the end of line 7, strike out the period and insert a semicolon and add the following: "Provided, That to obtain a loan on cotton, producer must furnish a certificate of grade and staple signed by a licensed classer whose license is issued by the United States Department of Agriculture."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I have no statement to make on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina). The Chair is ready to rule.

The bill now under consideration seeks to amend section 4, which deals with the amount only. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri seeks to add a proposition which might be germane to the original act but which seems to the Chair not to be related to the section of the act here sought to be amended by the pending bill. The Chair is therefore of the opinion that the amendment is not germane to the bill now being considered by the Committee, and therefore sustains the point of order of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill S. 3998, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-one Members have risen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 115, noes 37.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. This is an automatic call. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 247, nays 106, not voting 79, as follows:

INVESTMENT COMPANY ACT OF 1940 AND INVESTMENT ADVISERS ACT OF 1940

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10065) to provide for the registration and regulation of investment companies and investment advisers, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10065, with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I understand that under the unanimous consent granted yesterday the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON] controls one-half of the time—one hour and a half—and I will have control of one hour and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes. There are not many requests for time to discuss this bill for the regulation of investment companies. I think it can safely be said at this time that the entire 3 hours allotted for debate will not be consumed.

The bill comes to the committee with the unanimous approval of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The bill has been approved unanimously, I believe, by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate. After hearings before the Rules Committee of the House, the bill was approved by that committee and a rule was granted. Yesterday, by unanimous consent, the rule was dispensed with and made unnecessary, and the bill is now brought up in this fashion.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, as the Members will easily appreciate, is highly complicated and is a very important measure. This bill, I firmly believe, will not only restore the confidence of the small investor in investment companies but will perform the vital function of stimulating the flow of capital into industry, particularly those industries indispensable to the national defense.

The bill provides for the registration and regulation of investment trusts and investment companies and of investment advisers. The bill is the result of a most comprehensive study and investigation of those organizations, made by the Securities and Exchange Commission, pursuant to provisions contained in section 30 of the Public Utility Holding Act of 1935.

Many Members will remember that during the days of 1935 when the holding-company bill was passed—a bill which bore the name of the distinguished majority leader of this House—in connection with the consideration of that measure it was my pleasure to participate to some extent as a member of the committee in the deliberations of the committee and on the floor. The House at that time did not see fit to legislate at all with respect to investment trusts. In the Senate the Holding Company Act was amended to include a direction that an investigation of investment companies be made by the Securities and Exchange Commission. That amendment was agreed to in conference.

Section 30 of the Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 provides as follows:

The Commission—

Speaking of the Securities and Exchange Commission—is authorized and directed to make a study of the functions and activities of investment trusts and investment companies, the corporate structures, and investment policies of such trusts and companies, the influence exerted by such trusts and companies upon companies in which they are interested, and the influence exerted by interests affiliated with the management of such trusts and companies upon their investment policies, and to report the results of its studies and its recommendations to the Congress on or before January 4, 1937.

The study of the Commission disclosed that the problems of these organizations were far more extensive than the Congress or the Commission anticipated at that time, with the result that the report was not completed and filed until a considerable time after January 1937.

The Commission, in the course of its survey, studied every investment trust and investment company of substantial size. The Commission has submitted to the Congress reports aggregating approximately 6,000 pages, which cover in detail every phase of the functions and activities of these organizations and their deficiencies and abuses. Based on this survey and reports, a bill was introduced in the Senate (S. 3580) and a companion bill (H. R. 8935) was introduced in the House on March 14, 1940, by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Extensive hearings lasting for a period of 4 weeks were held on the bill by the Senate Subcommittee on Banking and Currency. At these hearings various members of the Commission and their experts, and various representatives of the investment-trust industry testified in detail with respect to the provisions of this bill.

The bill represents the result of intensive effort for a period of some 5 weeks by representatives of the industry and of the Commission. Not merely the principles of this bill, but also its provisions as drafted, are strongly endorsed both by the Securities and Exchange Commission and by the greatest part of the investment-trust industry. Thus the bill, as introduced and reported, has the distinction of having the virtually unanimous support of the persons for whose regulation it provides, as well as of the regulatory agency by which it is to be administered. Representatives of the industry urged upon the committee that the present international situation should not only not be a deterrent to the enactment of this legislation but should rather serve as a vital reason for its immediate passage. As was stated by Alfred Jaretzki, Jr., of Sullivan & Cromwell, counsel to a substantial portion of the investment-company industry:

We feel that this bill is not only a workable bill, but is a bill which is a good thing for the industry. We would like very much to see it passed, and we hope very much that it can be passed at this session. The industry would like to feel that it has regulation behind it; that is, that we may know what the regulation is to be and that we will no longer live in uncertainty as to what the future holds for us. This is the type of regulation under which the industry feels it can work and which it feels will be very beneficial to the industry. We are hopeful that if this legislation passes it will constitute a stimulus to the investment-company industry's contributing to venture capital.

* * * the critical period that we are going through now, rather than being a reason for postponing legislation, is, in our opinion, an added reason for passing this legislation. We feel that it would be helpful not only to the industry to have this legislation passed now * * * but also * * * we feel that it is a very healthy sign that Government and industry can come together and do a constructive job of this kind.

As was stated by Arthur Bunker, of Lehman Corporation, speaking on behalf of the industry before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

These principles again received the unanimous approval of the industry in the form of the bill which is now before you.

Since it has had that joint approval, we are naturally interested and accordingly we strongly urge its passage at the present session. We believe this to be a workable bill and a bill which will be beneficial to the industry. We recognize that abuses have existed in the industry and we feel that legislation is necessary to prevent their continuance and to help the better elements of the industry to raise the standards of the industry to increasingly higher levels.

We trust that the present national emergency should not be a deterrent to its enactment but should rather serve as an added reason for the passage of the bill.

We feel that it is a very healthy sign that the Government and industry can come together and do a constructive job of this character.

With this legislation the confidence of the public in investment companies will, we believe, be restored, and these companies will be able to serve not only the investor but also the important function of supplying new capital to those industries vital to the national defense.

Mr. Cyril Quinn, vice president of Tri-Continental Corporation, testified before the House committee:

I would like to say that the bill now before you, in my opinion, is a good bill. It is a workable bill in that the rules under which the industry will have to operate are clear and explicit, which I think is a requirement of any proper regulatory bill. I think it is a reasonable bill in that, while it sets up certain safeguards, it still leaves the management freedom of action in meeting the responsibilities of handling funds that are entrusted to it. I think also that it will be an effective bill in that certain practices in the past which have existed are safeguarded against, and certain desirable practices which many companies are now following are now required of all companies.

Ranald H. Macdonald, vice president of National Bond & Share Corporation, and chairman of the investment company committee of the Investment Bankers Association, testified:

We believe that this bill is entirely workable as it is now drawn and we believe that the bill should be passed and hope that it will be passed.

Paul C. Cabot, of State Street Investment Corporation, testified:

The present revised bill which you have before you, I think is an excellent one, and I am heartily in favor of it.

In the past there have been a great many abuses that have been brought to your attention by the reports of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

It is my considered opinion that this bill will eliminate, or at least largely mitigate, those abuses that have been present in the past and I hope that you will act favorably upon it.

Mr. Hugh Bullock, vice president of Calvin Bullock, testified:

I approve of this bill and hope very much indeed it will become law as soon as possible.

William Tudor Gardiner, former Governor of the State of Maine, representing Incorporated Investors, Boston, Mass., testified:

The more consideration I gave to the matter, the more important it seemed to me that there should be some such legislation as this.

Essentially, the investment-company industry involves the gathering together of cash and negotiable securities for management, and that facilitates a wrongful use if management falls into unscrupulous hands; if the managers are dishonest, unscrupulous, or even selfish, there can come great harm to the stockholders.

As to the form of this legislation, I must confess that at one time it appeared to me desirable if a simpler bill could be produced, but careful study satisfied me that the task can in no way be further simplified than it has been done in this bill.

The legislation must cover a great variety of investment companies, and that is one of the reasons for the length of this bill.

As some of the questions by the chairman, Mr. COLE, this morning indicated, publicity is a great regulating force; but in the case of complex corporate structures and practices, I think it is plain that publicity is not enough.

This bill, I believe, covers the situation adequately, and without undue restriction on legitimate business.

I would like to urge upon the committee the fact that many man-hours of work have gone into this piece of legislation. It has been a great demand on the time of many representatives of this industry.

We most earnestly hope that this matter will have your prompt consideration and that the action of the Congress may be favorable, so that the industry can carry on its other work.

Merrill Griswold, chairman of Massachusetts Investors Trust and Supervised Shares, Inc., testified as follows:

I should like to assure you that this measure has the practically unanimous approval of the open-end companies, as it is now drafted. The representatives who came here from Boston and New York and Chicago made it a point at all times to inform the smaller companies in their localities of what was going on and invite their criticism and to keep them fully posted.

Henry J. Simonson, Jr., president of the National Securities and Research Corporation, which sells periodic-payment-plan certificates testified as follows:

In conclusion, I want to say in behalf of the people that I represent in the periodic payment business, that we urge very strongly the passage of this bill. We think it will bring greater protection to the investors. We think that it will be a great thing for us, and we are sponsoring it.

Judge Willis I. Norton, testifying on behalf of Investors Syndicate, which sells guaranteed face amount certificates, said:

Our company is very heartily in favor of and very heartily endorses this bill. We think it is sound legislation.

Mr. James White, partner of Scudder, Stevens & Clark, of Boston, Mass., an investment counsel firm which also sponsors three open-end investment companies testified as follows with respect to title II of this bill which deals with investment counsel organizations:

My firm is heartily in favor of this bill.

We think it is necessary and we think it is constructive both in the public interest and in our own interest, in that of our investment-counsel business, and investment-trust business.

* * * * * * *

In the present form we think this legislation provides a set of rules that we can operate under without any difficulty at all, that it will certainly discourage people going into our line of business who are not qualified to or who have any thought of using a professional status as a cloak to cover up larceny or any illegal operations.

Mr. Dwight Rose, an investment counsel representing the Investment Counsel Association of America, testified with respect to title II, as follows:

At the time of the introduction of the original bill, or shortly following, I made a trip to the west coast and back, at which time I interviewed a large number of investment counsel firms and individuals who are not members of our association. I found almost all of them in agreement on the general principle of Federal regulation and registration, some minimum regulation. * * * Also the association has been advised by many investment counsel who are not members of the association, located in various parts of the country, who get into New York at rather frequent intervals, that practically all of them would endorse this bill, although I am not officially authorized to represent them.

The Investment Counsel Association of America unqualifiedly endorses the present bill, the Investment Company Act of 1940 and Investment Advisers Act of 1940, and in view of the difficult financial problems confronting our national economy at this critical juncture, we urgently hope passage of the bill may be expedited at this session of Congress so the public may have the benefit of the bill and its provisions without further delay.

In addition, communications were received from numerous investment companies approving the proposed legislation and urging its immediate passage.

This bill therefore has the unanimous approval of virtually the entire investment company industry, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency.

It is my firm conviction that the bill is a most progressive and salutary piece of legislation which is designed not only to protect the investor but to encourage the flow of new capital into industry.

The extent of public interest in investment companies is indicated by the fact that the industry has total assets of over $4,000,000,000, with approximately 2,000,000 investors throughout the country, 95 percent of whom own 100 shares or less with a value of $500 or less. More than half of the common-stock issues registered under the Securities Exchange Act of 1933 were in investment company issues ($2,200,000,000 of common stock of investment companies as compared with a total of $4,000,000,000, of all common-stock offerings). It has been estimated by the Commission that investment companies have an influence or controlling interest in noninvestment companies, the total resources of perhaps $30,000,000,000 including banks, insurance companies, aviation, and steamship companies, oil companies, chemical companies, and so forth.

The public contributed approximately $7,000,000,000 to investment trusts and companies and sustained a capital shrinkage of about $3,000,000,000 in the last decade. Of this loss it is estimated by the Securities and Exchange Commission that over a billion dollars was attributable to faithless management—management which was actuated by the pecuniary interest of the controlling persons rather than the interest of the investors.

This bill is designed to provide investors in all investment companies with adequate information with respect to the operation of their company; will prohibit persons convicted or enjoined in connection with securities frauds from being associated with these organizations; will insure the presence of independent members of boards of directors; will prohibit the unloading of securities by controlling persons and other insiders on their investment companies; will prevent the future pyramiding of one investment company upon another; will markedly simplify capital structures of investment companies and afford some measures of protection for senior security holders in these organizations; will tend to establish fair pricing and selling methods of investment company securities; will prohibt the issuance of stock for services and eliminate tricky management voting stocks; and will provide a more reasonable sales load on installment plans and insure these investors a more equitable interest in the fund.

The honest and respectable elements in the industry recognize that evils have existed which have cast a stigma upon the industry as a whole. For this reason these representatives have not only approved but have urged the immediate passage of this bill.

Title II of the bill deals with investment advisers—persons who, for compensation, advise individuals as to investment in securities. The provisions of this title have also been based on a study made by the Securities and Exchange Commission and have been approved by not only the investment advisers who appeared and testified before the committee, but by many other advisers. The title seeks to protect the public from frauds and misrepresentations of tipsters and touts and to safeguard the honest investment adviser against the stigma of the activities of these individuals. The bill makes fraudulent practices by investment advisers unlawful and requires investment advisers doing business by the use of the mails and the facilities of interstate commerce to register with the Commission which is empowered to deny registration to individuals convicted or enjoined by the courts for securities frauds.

The work of the Securities and Exchange Commission convinces me very definitely of the wisdom Congress shows at times in directing the various commissions, and at times the committees of Congress, to investigate important activities with which we must deal legislatively in the future. Following that long period during which the S. E. C. looked into this very difficult problem and the legislation before both Houses of Congress, it was found that many changes were advisable in the original bill; and, just as last year when the trust-indenture bill was before us the great banking industry of this country through their representatives sat around the table with the Securities and Exchange Commission and the members of your committee and worked out legislation, the same thing occurred again, and believe it or not, we worked out legislation free from any complaint or criticism, and I present to you today a bill which I think it safe to say 95 percent, if not all, of the industry affected supports.

Mr. Chairman, this great work—and I speak advisedly in applying that adjective—has been done by the Securities and Exchange Commission under the leadership of Judge Healy, a member of that Commission; Mr. David Schenker, counsel to the investment-trust study; Mr. John Hollands, of the Commission's staff; and a number of others working with them as a staff day and night, month after month, and year after year since we gave the Commission this assignment directing the investigation. The report of the Commission on the study reaches its culmination in the bill now before us. Their report to us disclosed the abuses of the past to which this industry has been subjected by many of its members whom I think the legislation before us will hereafter dispose of forever. I believe the Commission as a whole, especially the group associated so intimately and definitely with this problem, deserves the thanks of Congress and of this country for solving the problem in the way they recommended, and especially in a way that permits the industry affected to come hand-in-hand with the administrative side of this Government recommending after thorough consideration by your committee legislation of this importance and which I think the future will show to be of very vital interest and concern to the investing public. In this connection credit, too, must be given to the representatives of the industry who collaborated in the preparation of this bill: Alfred Jaretzki, Jr., of Sullivan and Cromwell, counsel for the closed-end companies; Warren Motley, of Boston, for the open-end companies; and Paul Bartholet, an expert on investment trusts in general.

I shall not discuss the provisions of this bill in too great detail. However, I would like to briefly outline its terms. [Applause.]

ANALYSIS OF PROVISIONS OF TITLE I

Findings and declaration of policy: Section 1 of the bill contains the findings of the Congress with respect to investment companies and the declaration of policy of the bill.

Definitions and exemptions of investment companies: Investment companies within the purview of this bill are in general defined as companies which are engaged primarily in the business of investing, reinvesting, and trading in securities; and issuers which invest in or hold securities—other than securities of noninvestment company subsidiaries—having a value exceeding 40 percent of the value of their total assets. A third group of investment companies covered by the bill are companies which engage in the business of issuing so-called face-amount installment certificates. Provision is made generally to exclude from the bill companies primarily engaged, directly or through subsidiaries, in the operation of a business other than that of an investment company. In addition, the bill specifically excludes brokers, underwriters, banks, insurance companies, common or commingled trust funds administered by a bank, bank holding company affiliates subject to the supervision of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, companies subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and those of their wholly owned subsidiaries substantially all of whose assets consist of securities of companies which themselves are subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, small-loan companies, factoring companies, companies dealing in mortgages or discount paper, holding companies subject to the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, and certain other special types of companies—section 3. The bill makes provision for the exempting of employees' investment companies, and certain other persons who are not within the intent of the proposed legislation—section 6.

Classification and subclassification of investment companies: Investment companies are broadly classified into three categories—management companies, unit investment trusts, and face-amount certificate companies. Management companies are divided into two types: open-end companies—companies in which the stockholder or certificate holder has a right to compel the company to redeem his shares at their asset value; and closed-end companies—companies in which the shareholders do not have such a right. Management companies, both of the open-end and closed-end type, are further subclassified upon the basis of the extent of the diversification of their investments, into diversified companies which, speaking generally, must have at least 75 percent of their assets in diversified securities and nondiversified companies which are not required so to diversify their investments—sections 4 and 5.

Transactions by unregistered investment companies: Investment companies, unless registered as provided in the bill, are forbidden to conduct their activities through use of the mails or instrumentalities of interstate commerce. Foreign investment companies may not register as investment companies or publicly offer securities of which they are the issuer in the United States unless the Commission finds that these foreign investment companies can be effectively subjected to the same type of regulation as domestic investment companies—section 7.

Registration of, disclosure of investment policy, and size of investment companies: Provision is made for the registration of investment companies with the Commission. In the main, the Commission may require the information required to register securities under the Securities Act of 1933 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. In addition, the registration statement must state the policy of the company as to items specifically enumerated in the bill and supply information with respect to the business affiliation and experience of the officers and directors of the company. Provision is made for the simplification of the registration procedure by permitting the filing of copies of registration statements already filed under the acts now administered by the Commission. No shift in the company's fundamental policies as stated in the registration statement may be made without the approval of a majority of the company's outstanding voting securities—sections 8 and 13.

To put a brake on the irresponsible formation of investment companies, no investment company organized hereafter may make a public offering of its securities unless it has or is assured of having at least $100,000 through private subscription. The bill does not contain any limitation with respect to maximum size of investment companies, but authorizes the Commission to study and report from time to time the effect of size of investment companies both on the national economy and on the trusts themselves—section 14.

Ineligibility of certain affiliated persons and underwriters: Any person who within 10 years has been convicted of a crime or is enjoined by a court in connection with a security or financial fraud is prohibited by the bill from acting as an officer or director of any investment company or in certain other capacities. The bill recognizes, however, that even such a person may rehabilitate himself and so the Commission is authorized to exempt persons from this prohibition where it is shown that the penalty as applied to any such person would be unduly or disproportionately severe or that the conduct of such person has been such as not to make it against the public interest or protection of investors that such exception be granted—section 9.

Provisions relating to directors, officers, and certain affiliated persons: In the future no person shall serve as a director of an investment company unless elected by the holders of its outstanding voting securities, except that, in effect, vacancies not exceeding one-third of the board occurring between meetings of stockholders may be filled in any otherwise legal manner. However, with respect to existing strict trusts, where no provision is made for election of trustees, the bill does not require an affirmative election of trustees but provides a procedure for their removal by certificate holders—section 16.

The bill provides that at least 40 percent of the board of directors of an investment company shall be independent; that is, no more than 60 percent may consist of investment advisers to the company or affiliated persons of such an adviser or officers or employees of the company. Moreover, a majority of the board of directors of an investment company must be composed of persons who are not regular brokers for the company or principal underwriters of its securities, or investment bankers, or in each case persons affiliated with them. An exception is made to take care of certain types of investment companies which are closely affiliated with investment advisers and which are designed primarily to make available this medium of diversification of investment to the smaller customers of these advisers. This exception is carefully safeguarded by specific conditions. Hereafter the majority of the board of directors of an investment company may not consist of persons who are officers or directors of any one bank, except that any investment company which, on March 15, 1940, shall have had a majority of its directors consisting of such persons may continue to do so—section 10.

In the future persons who are officers, directors, investment advisers, and so forth, or persons affiliated with such persons, may not, as principal, knowingly sell to or purchase from any investment company any securities or other property or borrow from any such investment company. Provision is made for certain exceptions with respect to transactions involving the company's own security issues and for transactions exempted by the Commission—section 17.

In general, agency transactions are not affected by the bill, but brokerage commissions are limited in the main to standard rates with provision for special exemptions. Provision is made that those officers and employees who have access to securities or funds of investment companies may be required to be bonded. Securities of investment companies must be placed in the custody either of banks, or with stock-exchange firms subject to supervision by the Commission as to methods of safekeeping—section 17.

Investment companies may not purchase securities underwritten by persons affiliated with the investment company, unless the investment company itself is a principal underwriter of such securities, until after the termination of the underwriting syndicate—section 10. Officers and directors of investment companies and certain other persons are not allowed to exculpate themselves from liability for any willful misfeasance, bad faith, gross negligence, or reckless disregard of their duties—section 17. The provisions of section 16 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 relating to transactions of officers, directors, and controlling persons which now apply to equity securities of investment companies whose securities are listed on a national securities exchange are made applicable to all securities of all registered closed-end companies—section 30. Gross misconduct or gross abuse of trust by directors, officers, investment advisers, principal underwriters, and so forth, is made a basis for injunctive proceedings in a Federal court to be instituted by the Commission—section 36. Larceny or embezzlement of property of investment companies is made a Federal crime—section 37.

Provisions with respect to certain activities of investment companies: Investment companies, generally speaking, may not trade on margin, participate in joint trading accounts, or effect short sales in portfolio securities in contravention of rules and regulations which may be prescribed. Investment companies may engage in underwriting activities if consistent with their declared investment policies—section 12. Upstream loans to investment companies, except by wholly owned subsidiaries, are prohibited—section 21.

Hereafter, an investment company or group of controlled companies may not purchase securities issued by another investment company if as a result of such acquisition such group will have more than 3 percent of the outstanding voting securities of such other investment company, or 5 percent of a specialized investment company. Investment companies, however, may increase their holdings in other investment companies of which they already hold 25 percent of the voting stock, since such holdings constitute presumptive control. A similar provision limits the acquisition by investment companies of an insurance company's stock to 10 percent, with additional exceptions relating to the organization of new insurance companies and the purchase of stock of insurance companies from other investment companies or where it is found that such acquisition is in the public interest because the financial condition of such insurance company will be improved as a result of such acquisition or any plan contemplated as a result thereof—section 12.

Cross and circular ownership as defined are prohibited in the future and existing cross and circular ownership must be eliminated within 5 years—section 20.

Although investment companies are in general prohibited from acquiring securities of persons engaged in the brokerage business or in the business of underwriting and dealing in securities, provision is made to permit investment companies, either alone or jointly with other investment companies, to purchase stock of a company engaged primarily in the business of underwriting and distributing securities and to acquire stock of a company formed to engage in the business of furnishing new capital to industry, financing promotional enterprises, and similar activities—section 12. It is hoped that investment companies will soon jointly form such a company. It is believed it should make a material contribution to national recovery.

Distribution, repurchases, and redemptions of investment company securities: No open-end company and no closed-end company may issue any of its securities except for cash or for securities—sections 22 and 23.

Publicly offered securities of all investment companies must be registered under the Securities Act of 1933, but provision is made to eliminate duplication in the material field under that act and the present bill. Circular literature intended for distribution to prospective purchasers of the securities of open-end companies, unit investment trusts, and face-amount certificate companies must be filed with the Commission—section 24.

Closed-end companies may not issue their common stock at a price below the current net asset value, except in connection with an offering to their security holders, conversion of a convertible security, exercise of any warrant outstanding on the date of enactment of this bill, or with consent of a majority of their stockholders. No closed-end company may repurchase any of its outstanding securities except on a securities exchange or open market upon prescribed notice to its stockholders or pursuant to tenders or under other circumstances to be prescribed to insure fair treatment of all security holders—section 23.

With respect to the distribution and redemption of securities issued by open-end companies, an association of securities dealers registered under section 15A of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 is, subject to the provisions of that section, empowered to make rules to protect investors, so far as is reasonably practicable, against any dilution of their equity due to the methods of pricing, distribution, and redemption of redeemable securities and to prevent grossly excessive sales loads on such securities. The Commission after 1 year is empowered to make rules and regulations to deal with these subjects. In other words, the industry is given a year in which to solve this problem for itself. In addition, provision is made to prohibit the sale of redeemable securities to any person other than a dealer or principal underwriter at a price less than that at which the security is sold to the public. The bill prohibits the suspension of redemption of a redeemable security for a period more than 7 days except during certain specified emergency periods or other period fixed by the Commission. The negotiability of open-end securities may not be restricted in contravention of provisions which may be formulated—section 22.

Capital structure: Except for refunding of outstanding securities and securities issued in connection with reorganizations, closed-end companies in the future may not issue more than three classes of securities—one class of security representing indebtedness, including loans not publicly distributed, one class of preferred stock, and one class of common stock. Securities representing indebtedness must have at the time of issue an asset coverage of at least 300 percent and preferred stock an asset coverage of at least 200 percent. Similarly no dividends or distributions may be declared or made upon the common stock unless the securities representing indebtedness and preferred stock issued in the future have an asset coverage of 300 percent and 200 percent, respectively, and dividends may not be paid on such preferred stock unless such indebtedness has an asset coverage of at least 200 percent. Voting rights are also provided for preferred stock and in certain contingencies for senior securities representing indebtedness other than loans. Temporary borrowings up to 5 percent are exempted from this provision—section 18.

Open-end investment companies are not permitted to issue any senior securities, except that such companies are permitted bank borrowings, provided that an asset coverage of 300 percent is maintained at all times for such borrowings—section 18.

Dividends: In respect of dividends on existing securities, as well as securities issued in the future, investment companies are required to disclose by written statement accompanying any dividend the source of such payment when made other than from the current or accumulated net income as defined—section 19.

Proxies and voting trusts: Solicitations of proxies, consents, and authorizations relating to securities of investment companies registered under this bill are to be subject to the regulations to which solicitations relating to securities listed on national securities exchanges are already subject by reason of the Commission's regulations adopted under section 14 (a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. To assure uniformity of interpretation and administration as between that act and the present bill, section 20 (a) of the bill has been so drafted as to follow verbatim section 14 (a) of the Securities Exchange Act, with only such slight modifications of language as are necessary because of the special classes of companies to which section 20 (a) applies.

Hereafter no public offering may be made of voting trust certificates of investment companies. Existing voting trusts may continue until their expiration—section 20.

Investment advisory contracts and contracts for distribution of open-end company securities: After 1 year from the effective date of the act all investment advisory or management contracts must be in writing, must prescribe in detail the compensation to be paid, and must be nonassignable and terminable upon 60 days' notice. In effect, the contract has to be approved by a majority of the voting stock, may be for an initial period of 2 years, and renewable annually thereafter by the board of directors or stockholders. Analogous provisions are incorporated with respect to contracts for the distribution of open-end company securities. Existing arrangements are permitted to continue for a period not exceeding 5 years—section 15.

Reorganizations of investment companies: With respect to investment company reorganizations as defined, the bill provides that the Commission, at the request of 25 percent of any class of the security holders to be affected by such reorganization, or on the request of a company which is a party to such a plan, may give an advisory opinion. The company is required to send a copy of such advisory opinion to its security holders. The Commission may institute injunction proceedings in a Federal court to restrain the consummation of grossly unfair plans of reorganization or plans which constitute gross misconduct or gross abuse of trust—section 25. The functions and duties of the Securities and Exchange Commission under the Bankruptcy Act remain unchanged.

Reports and accounting: Investment companies are required to file with the Commission annual reports, including financial statements, similar to the annual reports now filed with the Commission under the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 by companies having securities listed on national securities exchanges, and less comprehensive reports on a semiannual or quarterly basis. In addition, investment companies must file with the Commission copies of reports sent to their security holders and may be required to transmit semiannually to their stockholders reports containing certain specified financial and other information. The reports to stockholders may not be misleading in any material respect in the light of the reports filed with the Commission. Under other acts administered by the Commission, lacking such a provision as this, misleading financial statements, inconsistent with those filed with the Commission, have been sent security holders in an appreciable number of instances. Annual reports to the Commission and to stockholders may be required to be certified by independent public accountants, whose certificate must be based on a reasonably comprehensive audit—section 30.

The Commission is authorized to require investment companies and certain of their majority-owned subsidiaries to preserve accounts, records, and documents upon which the financial statements filed with the Commission are predicated. Investment advisers, depositors, and principal underwriters of certain investment companies may likewise be required to preserve records showing their transactions with the investment companies with which they are associated. These accounts, records, and documents are subject at all times to examination by the Commission or its representatives. The Commission is authorized to provide for a reasonable degree of uniformity in the accounting policies and principles to be followed by investment companies in maintaining their accounts and records and preparing the financial statements required in their report to the Commission and stockholders—section 31.

Subject to certain exceptions, the selection of independent public accountants of investment companies must be submitted for ratification or rejection to stockholders who, in addition, at any time by a majority vote may terminate their employment. The auditor's certificate must be addressed to security holders as well as the directors. The controller or other principal accounting officer of every company is to be chosen either by the board of directors of the company or by its security holders, and not merely be appointed by its executive officers. The Commission is also empowered to require accountants and auditors to keep reports and work sheets and other documents relating to investment companies—section 32.

Unit investment trusts: The trust indentures of unit investment trusts must designate as trustee or custodian a bank of a specified minimum size; must require that all property and funds of the trust will be held by the trustee; and that the trustee—which may not resign unless a successor trustee has been designated or the trust liquidated—be entitled to reimburse itself out of the trust property for its expenses actually incurred and fees actually earned. Except under special circumstances, the depositor or underwriter must be prohibited from deriving any fees from the trust other than the original sales load for distributing the shares. Provision must also be made to advise shareholders of portfolio changes. Finally, proceedings in court may be instituted by the Commission to liquidate so-called orphan trusts—section 26.

Periodic payment plans: The bill contains additional provisions which relate specifically to companies issuing periodic-payment-plan certificates. These provisions fall roughly into three classes: Provisions relative to sales load; provisions regulating the incidents and denominations of the certificates, and provisions regarding custodianship. The sales load is limited to 9 percent. Recognizing the heavier initial expense, due primarily to sales commissions, the bill permits half of the sales load to be taken out during the first year of the plan; the balance is to be spread equally over the subsequent years. To prevent evasion of these restrictions on sales load by the imposition of so-called management fees, the Commission is authorized to prescribe maximum management fees. The provision relating to sales load may be modified by the Commission to meet the problems of small companies. Periodic-payment-plan certificates must be redeemable securities; and the initial payment under any plan must be at least $20, with each subsequent payment at least $10—section 27.

Face-amount-certificate companies: Companies which sell face-amount certificates are generally subject to the provisions of the bill but must comply with certain provisions which are specifically applicable to that type of company. The bill contains provisions with respect to minimum capitalization of face-amount-certificate companies. All companies which in the future sell these certificates must at all times maintain reserves, which, accumulated at a rate not to exceed 3½ percent compounded annually, must provide an amount sufficient to meet at all times all the liabilities and obligations of the company to all its certificate holders. The companies must have cash or qualified investments (investments which are qualified under the Code for the District of Columbia for life insurance companies) of a value not less than the aggregate of their capital and reserve requirements. The bill makes provision to require deposit with certain qualified banks of all or any part of the investments maintained by such company as certificate reserve requirements except that the company may be credited with deposits made pursuant to law or regulation with State authorities in respect to liabilities of the certificates sold to the residents of such States. The bill makes provision for the distribution of the loading charge (the maximum amount of which charge is fixed by the bill) over the life of the certificate. In essence, no more than 50 percent of the load may be taken out the first year, no more than 7 percent in each of the following 4 years, and not more than 4 percent the remaining years. The surrender value of the certificate for the first year must be equal to at least 50 percent of the gross annual payment made on the certificate and for any subsequent time must be the amount of reserve of such certificate less a prescribed surrender charge. A certificate may not contain a provision making the holder liable for any unpaid balance on the certificate and must provide for the issuance to the certificate holder upon the happening of certain contingencies of a so-called paid-up certificate.

The obligations of the company to a certificate holder, who has defaulted, are specifically enumerated in the bill—section 28. If a face-amount company does not maintain the minimum certificate reserve on all its outstanding face-amount certificates issued prior to the effective date of the bill then the company cannot make any distribution or pay any dividend on any senior capital security which exceeds a prescribed percentage of its earnings or which the Commission determines might impair the financial integrity of the company or its ability to meet its liabilities on the outstanding certificates. In the future, face-amount certificate companies cannot issue senior capital securities in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors, or if such company has such senior capital securities outstanding to make any distribution or pay any dividend in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe to insure the financial integrity of the company and to prevent the impairment of the company's abilities to meet its obligations on its face-amount certificates—section 18. A face-amount company can acquire the securities of another face-amount company only upon certain prescribed conditions—section 12. The bill makes provision to obtain equality of treatment of certificate holders who are residents of various States in the event of bankruptcy of a face-amount company. The bill preserves the rights of residents in those States which require specific deposits with their State officials but makes provision for equalization of treatment of all certificate holders, by providing that residents of other States must receive an amount equal to that received by the residents of States with deposits, before the latter can share in the general assets of the bankrupt company—section 29.

Unlawful representations: The bill contains the usual provisions prohibiting misrepresentations and half-truths in registration statements, reports, and other documents filed with the Commission, and prohibiting the misrepresentation of the effect of registration with the Commission. In addition, the use of misleading names by registered investment companies is specifically prohibited. The latter provisions may be enforced by order of the Commission when the name is adopted after the effective date of the bill, and by a court at the suit of the Commission as to names theretofore adopted—sections 34 (b), 35.

Administrative and enforcement machinery: The bill contains ample provisions, but appropriately circumscribed, for the enforcement of its provisions; for the carrying out of the powers and duties vested in the Commission, and for court review of the Commission's action—sections 38 to 46, 49.

Formal provisions: The bill contains the usual provisions regarding validity of contracts, liability of controlling persons, the effect of the bill on existing law, and separability of provisions. The effective date of title I is November 1, 1940, as to all companies except face-amount certificate companies, as to which the bill does not become effective until January 1, 1941. The short title of the bill is the "Investment Company Act of 1940"—sections 47, 48, 50 to 53.

ANALYSIS OF PROVISIONS OF TITLE II

Findings and definitions: Sections 201 and 202 contain, respectively, the findings of the Congress with respect to investment advisers and the definitions of various terms used in title II. The term "investment adviser" is so defined as specifically to exclude banks, bank holding company affiliates, lawyers, accountants, engineers, teachers, brokers—insofar as their advice is merely incidental to brokerage transactions for which they receive only brokerage commissions—publishers of bona fide newspapers, news magazines, or financial publications of general and regular circulation, and persons whose advice is limited to securites issued by the United States and certain instrumentalities of the United States. In addition, the Commission is authorized by rules and regulations or order, to make certain further exceptions according to prescribed statutory standards.

Registration of investment advisers: Investment advisers who make use of the mails or instrumentalities of interstate commerce in connection with their investment advisory business, unless they fall within one of the specific exemptions provided in section 203 (b), are required to register by filing with the Commission an application for registration containing certain information, the character of which is specified in the bill. The administrative machinery for registration is similar to that provided in the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 for the registration of over-the-counter brokers and dealers. Registration may be denied or revoked if the registrant has within 10 years been convicted of a crime or is enjoined by a court in connection with a security or financial fraud, or if his application for registration is materially misleading. The data contained in the application for registration must be kept reasonably current by such annual and special reports as the Commission may require for that purpose—sections 203, 204.

Investment advisory contracts: Contracts or agreements between an investment adviser and a client may not provide for compensation to the investment adviser based upon capital gains or capital appreciation. Each such contract must be nonassignable, and must provide, if the investment adviser is a partnership, that the client will be notified of any change in the membership of the firm, so that he will be in a position, if he so desires, to disaffirm the contract—section 205.

Certain prohibited transactions: Transactions and practices which defraud or operate as a fraud or deceit upon clients or prospective clients are prohibited. Registered investment advisers are also forbidden to purchase securities from or sell securities to any client, either as principal or in connection with a brokerage business, without first advising the client of the transaction and obtaining his consent thereto—section 206.

Unlawful representations, administrative and enforcement machinery, and formal provisions: In these respects title II contains provisions generally comparable to those of title I—sections 207 to 221, inclusive. Section 210, which relates to publicity, recognizes that in many instances the adviser-client relationship has a confidential basis, and provides for confidential treatment of information obtained in the administration and enforcement of the title, to the extent that such treatment is consistent with efficient enforcement.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] is to be highly complimented, for as chairman of the subcommittee of our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce he has brought to you a most remarkable bill. It is particularly remarkable in that it comes here unanimously approved by our committee and by both Government and the businesses affected. I do not know when a bill of this importance has been brought to the House in which not only the Government agency affected, in this case the Securities and Exchange Commission, but also the industries to be regulated, have been in such unanimous accord. The committee itself was unanimous in voting to report the bill to the House. However, I personally have had a certain hesitation and mental reservation, so to speak, in connection with title II of the bill, and it has been agreed by Judge Healy, Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, that he would support a resolution, which I give notice now I shall later introduce, to investigate the subject covered by title II of this bill, namely, the regulation of investment advisers.

I have suggested this because I have certain qualms concerning the workability of title II. In the first place, an investment adviser is in a peculiar relationship with his client. Investment advisers are in the relationship somewhat of a physician to his patient. There is a question in my mind whether or not an investment adviser is actually engaged in interstate commerce. Is he any different in laying out a prescription for his client as to what the client should purchase or sell on his investment account? Is he any different in that respect from the doctor who issues a prescription to his client for his physical correction? There is a grave question in my mind as to the constitutionality of this title in respect to the necessity for registration of these people by virtue of their engaging, as supposed in this section, in interstate commerce.

Title II does something else. It exempts from the requirement to register as investment advisers, banks and certain holding-company affiliates; lawyers, accountants, engineers, or teachers whose performance of investment advisory services is solely incidental to the practice of their professions; any broker or dealer whose performance of such service is solely incidental to the conduct of his business as a broker or dealer and who receives no special compensation therefor; the publisher of any bona fide newspaper, news magazine, or business or financial publication of general and regular circulation; any person whose advice, analyses, or reports relate to no securities other than securities which are direct obligations of or obligations guaranteed as to principal or interest by the United States, and so forth.

In other words, it has exempted from the registration provisions of this bill some of the largest groups of investment advisers in the business, namely, the banker, the lawyer, the income-tax accountant frequently, and a number of others who, regardless of their competency, have practiced investment advising over a long period of time.

I fail to see why such groups as just mentioned should be exempt from registration, if the professional adviser must register, when it is these groups that do most of the advising on investments for the widows, the orphans, the executors of small estates, and the ordinary, common run of small investors, businessmen, and thrifty workers. In fact, if any advisers are to be regulated, it would seem to me that some of the worst advice given to those who can least afford to lose is handed out by these very groups. The professional investment adviser is not interested in such small accounts as they are more bother than the small fees are worth, so these people consult with whoever may be in a confidential relationship to them. In these cases—and there are hundreds of thousands of them—there is no recourse except for demonstrable fraud.

Title II of this bill has been agreed to by the Investment Advisers' Association, composed, as I understand, of some four-hundred-and-odd, more or less large, firms engaged in the advising business. The members of that association are to be complimented for their desire to improve the status of their profession and to improve its quality. But, after all, the proof of the pudding is in the eating of it, and the proof of the investment counsel's service is in the long-run results attained. The mere setting up in business as investment adviser does not make the advice sound. Yet under this bill anyone of almost any qualification can demand a certificate of registration as an investment adviser, providing he has a reasonably clean record. There are hundreds of small partnerships and thousands of individuals in the United States who act as investment counsel and who, I believe, were not consulted in setting up title II. Many of them have contractual relationships with their clients that are not in accordance with the provisions of this bill and may, in fact, be in violation of it. There is a serious question whether or not the contractual restrictions in this bill are not in themselves a violation of the right of contract as between employer and employee or between principal and agent or in the ordinary professional relationship. I do not know the answer to that, but the question has been raised. I am not here defending the principles involved in these relationships, but I raise the question of right to contract.

Then, registration itself lends color of Federal approval to anyone to whom is issued a certificate of registration by the Securities and Exchange Commission. If I am to go into the investment advising business, or if you should go into it, and can hang that sign out in front of your door stating that you are "registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission," it gives a certain color of honesty, ability, and integrity to you which you may in nowise possess.

It is true that the Commission may investigate applicants for registration and refuse to issue a certificate until after a hearing, but the requirements for registration are largely negative in character. Adequate positive qualifications do not appear in this bill. The Investment Advisers' Association has conducted an inquiry into this subject and arrived at no very definite conclusions. In fact, they acknowledge that, while a formal education for an investment adviser is desirable, yet a formal education does not necessarily produce a competent adviser. Judgment is a rare quality, indeed, but a good investment adviser must be something of a reliable prophet and a seer to boot. If a rich man loses through bad advice, that is too bad, but if a widow or a minor or a man in very modest circumstances loses that is a tragedy, and its magnitude is inversely proportional to the wealth of the loser.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this whole subject should be further investigated. Judge Healy admitted to me privately that there might be certain sections of this bill which would have to be changed in the course of time. I do not desire to take any more of the time of the House this afternoon. I congratulate the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON] on the splendid work of their subcommittee and recommend that the House approve this bill. I again announce that at a later time I will introduce the resolution to which I have previously referred.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, realizing there is nothing perfect under the sun and that we never get an absolutely perfect bill, I shall support this legislation. I agree with the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW] that in exempting bankers, brokers, and lawyers, the committee has perhaps made a mistake. But let us see whether it will not nevertheless do a great deal of good and accomplish some of the things we have been seeking to accomplish; that is, bring about a little more honesty and decency in all these investment matters so far as the investment brokers and bankers are concerned.

I want to compliment the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE], and I want to thank the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee for giving to the country this legislation which in the first place created the Commission which made this report and on which report and recommendation this legislation is based. In 1929 I started after unprincipled investment bankers and all those affiliated and connected with them, particularly those investment bankers and brokers who robbed the people of this country of billions and billions of dollars, those conscienceless manipulators who started in 1925 to unload upon the public millions upon millions of worthless securities, who brought about the great inflation in 1927 and 1928 and the subsequent crash of 1929, those fellows who nearly bankrupted the entire Nation, closed most of our banks, prostrated our industries, and deprived millions of our people of their life savings. I think the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House has really rendered a great service in presenting this bill. Before the legislation creating the Securities Exchange Commission the stock exchanges and that horde of money changers affiliated with them, whether it was the big board, the Curb, or the various other exchanges, listed most any kind of stock and unloaded it upon the public.

The issuance of stock to the extent of from three to five times the actual value of properties was the commonest sort of practice by these dishonest stock-manipulating geniuses. They got their own stock at inside prices fixed by themselves. Not only was the public taken in, but the small bankers and their depositors as well. The financial upheaval that followed will never be forgotten. Though perhaps under the then existing law these grafters and scoundrels may not, strictly speaking, have been guilty of larceny, I do not hesitate to say that in my own opinion their brutal get-rich-quick schemes which ruined so many innocent people constituted outright larceny, and there is no other way to describe them. If Whitney, the once New York Stock Exchange "big shot," now in prison, or President Hoover, had listened to my warnings early in 1929, the catastrophe that came near wrecking our whole financial structure could have been averted.

Under the law we passed in 1933 and amended in 1934 and 1935, these abuses have to some extent, at least, been eliminated, and the sharpers, gangsters, brokers, and gamblers have not had the same opportunity they formerly had to rob the American public.

I believe this proposed legislation, though not perfect, will be wholesome and beneficial. As chairman of a select committee of the House making an investigation in 1934 and 1935, I ascertained that many of the investment trusts, after unloading their stock upon the public, removed the valuable stocks and bonds against which they issued their stock and substituted a lot of "cats and dogs" that had no value, thereby robbing thousands upon thousands of people who invested in the stock of those investment companies.

If I had done nothing else in my many years in this House, the fact that I started in 1929 the investigation which has finally resulted in this legislation leaves me contented that I have been of at least some value to the House and to the country.

Although I would have preferred to see somewhat stronger restrictions in the bill, taking everything into consideration, and believing that in times such as these we should try to work in harmony, I feel that the committee has used good judgment in yielding in some respects and bringing out a bill that has been approved even by those whom it affects, which is something unusual.

Mr. Chairman, I am especially pleased to observe so many Republican Members supporting this proposed legislation in the interest of the investing public, but I am afraid, very much afraid, that it will not be approved by the Wall Street gambling fraternity that is supporting Mr. Willkie for President. Their gambling operations have already been retarded considerably by this type of legislation and by this administration, and the passage of this bill will retard them still more. They are hopeful, no doubt, that if Mr. Willkie becomes President they will be able to again conduct their precious business (?) in Wall Street and on the stock exchanges without interference.

But my advice to them is to forget their daydreams and start to devote themselves to such legitimate pursuits as will require no interference or Government regulation.

Mr. Chairman, the Securities Exchange Commission has made a very exhaustive study of improprieties in the use of these large pools of small investors' money by insiders and self-appointed managers.

Very definitely the bill deals with protecting the investing public against machinations such as I have been fighting against for many, many years. There are a great number of individual points covered in the bill, some of which are:

Prohibition of interlocking directorates.

Definite classification of investments that any particular investment trust may buy for their portfolio.

Duty to divulge such security holdings as lodge control in any individual investment trust.

Restriction of the amount of its own paper that any investment trust may sell to the public, when considering its good assets.

Restriction of issuance of preferred stock by any individual investment trust according to its annual profit yield; in other words, this prohibits watering.

Gives right to stockholders to nullify voting rights and privileges of preferred stockholders when sufficient yield is not earned during any year on existing capitalization.

Gives right to stockholders by 60-percent majority to oust undesirable officers and directors.

These are the chief advantages, although there are probably 100 or more, all of which are designed to protect the investor and make impossible recurrence of the unscrupulous financiers' use of other people's money for selfish interest and his own aggrandizement.

Passage of this bill will expand the regulatory powers of the S. E. C. into still another channel of finance, as it should, and will tend to reestablish the confidence of millions of small investors in long-term securities through investment trusts. This should be of great assistance to expansion of industry and commerce.

In conjunction with the Securities Acts of 1933 and 1935, and the Chandler bill, this closes another door on the financial crooks.

For all these reasons I heartily endorse the bill and urge its prompt enactment into law. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as may be necessary.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to speak at length on the pending bill. Without discussion of the details of the bill I wish merely to emphasize the necessity for this regulatory legislation and the extreme care that has been exercised by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to present to the House legislation that will be adequate to effectively protect the investing public, in the type of investments covered by the bill, and at the same time provide against regulation that would unreasonably handicap investment companies from performing a service to the public that has become an important part of our economic and financial structure.

This bill and a similar one introduced in the Senate are the outgrowth of a study and inquiry made by the Securities and Exchange Commission into the methods and policies of investment companies. This investigation was undertaken by the Commission pursuant to the authority and direction contained in the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935. The report of the Commission showed that many irregularities and unfair practices in the management of investment trusts and investment companies had resulted in losses of considerable sums to large numbers of investors. Responsible companies and individuals engaged in the business were anxious that these improper methods and policies that brought the industry into disrepute and resulted in loss of confidence by the investing public should be corrected. Thus, the work of the Commission was not a mere "witch hunting" expedition nor based upon a desire to harass honest business. It was entirely an effort to preserve a necessary and important agency of business from improper use by some unscrupulous manipulators to the detriment of honest men who sought to conduct the business on a basis of honesty and integrity, and to save the investor from the losses that were incident to doing business with those who were not actuated by honest motives.

In discussing the public interest in investment trusts and investment companies Robert E. Healy, Commissioner of the Securities and Exchange Commission, who had general supervision of the investment-trust study testified at the committee hearings that:

> The American public has contributed over $7,000,000,000 to those organizations. That is on the basis of investment. You can compare that with $14,000,000,000 roughly estimated as the investment in the electric-light industry. The value of their assets at present is approximately $4,000,000,000. * * * With respect to 22 of the bankrupt companies upon which the Commission has reasonably accurate figures, the security holders sustained a capital loss to December 31, 1935, of approximately $510,000,000 out of a total net capital contribution of almost $560,000,000, or a loss of about 90 percent. Altogether, investors have sustained a capital shrinkage of approximately $3,000,000,000 in all types of investment trusts and investment companies.

This tremendous loss, of course, was not entirely due to fraudulent practices, but was attributable to a large extent to the decline in security values since 1929. However, the fact remains that in a substantial number of cases, losses suffered by investors were due to unscrupulous management of the investment trusts and investment companies.

Mr. Healy further testified:

> Many individual investment companies have total assets equal to those of the larger savings banks. Their securities are owned by approximately 3,000,000 investors throughout this country, with the majority of the individual investments in such securities having a value of under $500. The number of security holders of investment trusts and companies probably exceeds that of all other industries except utility holding company systems. It is estimated that one out of every 10 holders of securities of all types in this country is a holder of investment trust and investment company shares or certificates.

In addition, investment companies at present control or are in a position to control or importantly influence various industrial, banking, utility, and other enterprises having total assets which, as of the end of 1935, amounted to some $30,000,000,000. Furthermore, these investment trusts and investment companies, because of their very substantial trading in securities on stock exchanges, are a most substantial factor in our securities markets.

Because of the large public interest in these organizations, and because these investment trusts and investment companies represent unsupervised pools of savings, these institutions have been a matter of concern to representatives of the investment company industry, stock exchanges, financial writers, and governmental bodies from the early period of their existence in this country. The potential dangers of these organizations have been indicated, and with the passing years criticism has increased.

The hearings before the committee showed many of the abuses that have existed in the conduct of investment trusts and investment companies. Unscrupulous individuals in control of some of these investment companies have not hesitated to engage in dealings between themselves as officers and with other companies in which they were interested. In some instances they have purchased from such other companies for the investment companies worthless securities at high prices, or sold securities of the investment companies to other companies in which they were interested at ridiculously low prices, or have borrowed as individuals from the investment companies and failed to pay back the sums borrowed. I mention only these few instances of dishonest practices to illustrate the methods in use by some of the dishonest manipulators of the funds invested by the public. Many other practices equally dishonest have been utilized. Furthermore, without regulation the investor has not always been able to obtain accurate financial reports as to the operation of the companies in which he was interested. Often such reports were misleading or actually dishonest. All of which made it easy to fleece the investor.

It is not to be assumed that all or even most of the investment trusts and companies have been guilty of dishonest practices. But, it has nevertheless existed to such an extent as to make it necessary in the public interest to provide a Federal system of regulation and control to insure upon the part of all such companies an honesty of management that will make all such investments reasonably secure. It is that very thing this bill seeks to accomplish.

The Securities Act of 1933 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 have not been effectual in preventing the type of abuses that have grown up in the investment field. These acts merely provide for publicity. This, however, has not provided adequate security to the investing public. And, furthermore, many investment companies have not come within the provisions of either of these acts.

It is the opinion of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and representatives of the industry itself, that regulation and control of investment trusts and investment companies is necessary for the protection of the public and best for the industry. Consequently this legislation represents the combined efforts and study of all these and has the approval of all. The committee has offered this legislation to the House in the belief that it will remove abuses that have existed and will establish the investment business on a basis that will encourage the confidence of the public.

Before concluding my remarks, I wish to pay tribute, deserved tribute, to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] for the important part that has been taken by him in formulating this legislation along lines that would prove effectual in regulating investment trusts and investment companies, but in a manner that would not unreasonably handicap this important industry in the carrying on of its important part in our economic and financial structure.

But in addition to this important service rendered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE], he also was instrumental in inaugurating a new practice that will, in my opinion, whenever utilized, result in worth-while legislation, namely, that of having representatives of the business or industry to be affected by the legislation sit down with the regulatory body, and, around the table, discuss the problems and arrive at a fair and reasonable solution of them. That practice was pursued in formulating the present legislation. It has therefore come before this House with the approval of both the Securities and Exchange Commission and representatives of the investment industry. It likewise has the unanimous support of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It is legislation that is entitled to have the unanimous support of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], such time as he may desire to use.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Chairman, I regard this bill as a substantial contribution for the benefit of investors as well as the business interests of the country. It provides constructive regulation without any destructive burdens or purpose. A notable feature of the bill is that it is the outgrowth of cooperation; it represents the well-considered judgment of both the investment world and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The words just spoken by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON] when he complimented the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] for his part in this legislation were well spoken. This legislation is an example of cooperation of businessmen and representatives of the Government in trying to provide constructive legislation. It is legislation that should be helpful and not unduly burdensome or harmful; it is an example that may well be followed in the future.

There has been a purpose on the part of our committee to encourage this sort of cooperation. Some months ago the chairman of this committee had a number of applications from business people, particularly, those interested in the securities market and those interested in removing any handicaps to investment capital, to have a hearing on the question of modifying the Securities Act and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. Some doubt existed as to whether or not such an investigation could appropriately or advantageously be conducted so near a Presidential election, but, finally, on the understanding that a hearing would be had dealing with the economic problems and not the political ones involved, the committee arranged a meeting in which the business interests of the United States were to have an opportunity to come before the committee and to present their criticism as to what should or should not be done by the Government in the regulation of the securities market in order that we might remove every handicap that unnecessarily restrains investment capital.

At the time this matter was set for hearing, as chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I made a statement as to the purposes of the hearing, as follows:

We have now had several years' experience under each of these acts. This was pioneer legislation. We can naturally expect that out of years of experience defects in these laws as well as in their administration have been revealed and which should be corrected. The country as a whole does not question the general purposes of these acts or the necessity of such protective legislation. We do need, however, the removal of every unnecessary handicap to business, whether of governmental or economic character.

It appears that in the last 10 years capital investment has not equaled depletion in the business plants of the country. There is a great volume of idle capital. Idle capital means idle men and a decreased volume of business. To remove unnecessary handicaps and encourage the investment of this capital are among the greatest problems of the Nation. The economic welfare of the country, as well as its social progress are dependent upon both capital and labor employment. This partial stagnation of capital investment has continued over a 10-year period and must have some important fundamental reasons behind it. The law affecting securities and their administration perhaps does not constitute more than a minor part of the main problem, but yet possibly a phase of importance.

It is not expected that legislation will result from the hearing this year. The move is rather preliminary and of an educational character as preparatory to the consideration of any legislation that may be found necessary to improve the situation at the next session of Congress.

It is believed that a fair presentation of the facts by experienced businessmen from an economic and practical viewpoint without partisan motives will help the country to understand these problems and to give better support to appropriate legislation.

Following the setting of that hearing before our committee, the Securities and Exchange Commission and representatives of business got together and it was jointly agreed that they would prefer that instead of having the hearing now, a study should be made—a joint study by representatives of the Securities Commission and the business and investment interests of the country—with the idea of examining these acts in the light of the experience that has developed in the last 5 years, to find out what, if anything, should be done to improve these acts and to remove any unnecessary burdens or restraints upon investment capital. In view of that agreement the hearing was canceled. That study is to go on from now until January. When January comes, regardless of what party may be in control of this House, I hope an intelligent and searching consideration of these problems will be made. Then I hope all needed improvement in these laws will be enacted. I would be disappointed if such a hearing does not develop legislation that will constructively encourage the investment of capital in this country.

So I believe that in this respect the committee is doing a useful work.

Before closing these brief remarks I want to say much credit is deserved by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE]. He performs a real service to this country when, conscientiously and industriously and with a world of good sense, he devotes himself to constructive legislation such as this. [Applause.] I consider the man in this body, whoever he may be, whether in committee or anywhere else, who devotes himself conscientiously to the development of constructive legislation that affects the welfare of the 130,000,000 people of this country is doing a great service. A man does a great service in this body if he does nothing but vote right; but if, in addition to voting right, he makes constructive contributions that really help the country, his is, indeed, a very great service.

I want also to compliment the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON]. He gives to legislation before our committee the benefit of his ripened judgment, his skill and ability as a lawyer, and his fine conception of the duty of a public servant. We are fortunate in our committee and this body is fortunate in having two men like these gentlemen to serve their country disinterestedly, but devotedly, and with a great deal of ability. [Applause.]

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much the references to my service on this committee and to the work on this and other legislation administered by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The truth is that the work of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee is accomplished by the generous cooperation of all its members, at times functioning through various subcommittees. I can go back in my recollection to the many hours that we have spent together in legislation—now important law—administered so efficiently by the Securities and Exchange Commission. Take for instance the subcommittee which handled this bill, and over which I presided, and on which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. REECE], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'TOOLE], and formerly the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Mapes, served. All of them participated in the work required to bring to the committee this bill so unanimously accepted by the Members today.

I have served with almost every member of the splendid group making up the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House on subcommittees dealing with intricate and difficult problems assigned to us from time to time. It has been my experience that all of them are most anxious to apply their ability and conception of what is needed in these important times without regard to the long hours or the amount of work required. They are all hard-working and industrious members. Certainly this demonstration here today of the House accepting without a dissenting vote one of the most controversial and important pieces of legislation is sufficient evidence in which the great committee, which I represent here today, is held by the Congress of the United States.

I have mentioned the service of our late colleague, Mr. Mapes, of Michigan. He was a great statesman and one of the real members of the committee. His place as ranking minority member is filled by the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON]. Congressman WOLVERTON is one of the best lawyers I have ever known. I sometimes wonder if the membership of the House realizes how many hours of hard and painstaking work he put in on legislation. His value as a member of this committee is hard to estimate.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, when this great committee with which I was connected for 24 years comes before the House, I still have a great pride in it. It is composed of great big fellows and it does great big work. For a committee like this to bring in unanimously a far-reaching bill such as this and for the House to show the confidence in it that it will in the passage of the bill today, is a compliment that comes to few committees.

I listened to the complimentary remarks the chairman of the committee, Mr. LEA, made with reference to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON]. I take this moment to refer to a man who is absent from that committee now, but who was for many years the ranking minority member of the committee during the years that I was chairman of it. Mr. Chairman, I have served with probably 1,800 men since I first entered this hall, but I say to you that I never served with a better man, and in my opinion there was never a finer gentleman, a finer Congressman, or abler statesman in this House than my lamented colleague, Carl Mapes. [Applause.] He was gentle; he was fine; he was able. As I say, I have taken this moment not only to congratulate this great committee upon its fine work, but to say this word in tribute to a great man who has passed on.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no other yielding of time, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read and be open to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, there are numerous committee amendments, many of them clarifying, none controversial. I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be considered in bulk and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments are as follows:

Page 12, line 9, strike out "prescribed" and insert in lieu thereof "described."

Page 19, line 2, after the word "securities", insert "or the issuer thereof."

Page 20, line 3, strike out all the line and insert in lieu thereof "so determined is not in excess of market value or asset value of such securities in the case of majority-owned subsidiaries, and is not in excess of market value in the case of other controlled companies."

"(3) Any company which since the effective date of this title or within 5 years prior to such date has been reorganized under the supervision of a court of competent jurisdiction, if (A) such company was not an investment company at the commencement of such reorganization proceedings, (B) at the conclusion of such proceedings all outstanding securities of such company were owned by creditors of such company or by persons to whom such securities were issued on account of creditors' claims, and (C) more than 50 percent of the voting securities of such company, and securities representing more than 50 percent of the net asset value of such company, are currently owned beneficially by not more than 25 persons; but such exemption shall terminate if any security of which such company is the issuer is offered for sale or sold to the public after the conclusion of such proceedings by the issuer or by or through any underwriter. For the purposes of this paragraph, any new company organized as part of the reorganization shall be deemed the same company as its predecessor; and beneficial ownership shall be determined in the manner provided in section 3 (c) (1)."

"(d) The Commission, by rules and regulations or order, shall exempt a closed-end investment company from any or all provisions of this title, but subject to such terms and conditions as may be necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors, if—

"(1) the aggregate sums received by such company from the sale of all its outstanding securities, plus the aggregate offering price of all securities of which such company is the issuer and which it proposes to offer for sale, does not exceed $100,000;

"(2) no security of which such company is the issuer has been or is proposed to be sold by such company or any underwriter therefor, in connection with a public offering, to any person who is not a resident of the State under the laws of which such company is organized or otherwise created; and

"(3) such exemption is not contrary to the public interest or inconsistent with the protection of investors."

Page 46, after line 7, strike out all of lines 8, 9, 10, and 11 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

Page 71, line 20, after "place", insert "and maintain."

Page 72, strike out all of lines 1 to 14, inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert the following: "subject to such rules and regulations as the Commission may from time to time prescribe for the protection of investors; or (3) such registered company, but only in accordance with such rules and regulations or orders as the Commission may from time to time prescribe for the protection of investors. Rules, regulations, and orders of the Commission under this subsection, among other things, may make appropriate provision with respect to such matters as the earmarking, segregation, and hypothecation of such securities and investments, and may provide for or require periodic or other inspections by any or all of the following: Independent public accountants, employees and agents of the Commission, and such other persons as the Commission may designate. No such member which trades in securities for its own account may act as custodian except in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Commission for the protection of investors."

Page 93, line 3, after the period at the end of the line, insert a new sentence as follows: "Any company which, as of March 15, 1940, was required by provision of its charter, certificate of incorporation, articles of association, or trust indenture, or of a bylaw or regulation duly adopted thereunder, to postpone the date of payment or satisfaction upon redemption of redeemable securities issued by it, shall be exempt from the requirements of this subsection; but such exemption shall terminate upon the expiration of 1 year from the effective date of this title, or upon the repeal or amendment of such provision, or upon the sale by such company after March 15, 1940, of any security (other than short-term paper) of which it is the issuer, whichever first occurs."

Page 93, strike out all of lines 12, 13, and 14 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"(g) No registered open-end company shall issue any of its securities (1) for services; or (2) for property other than cash or securities (including securities of which such registered company is the issuer), except as a dividend or distribution to its security holders or in connection with a reorganization."

Page 93, strike out all of lines 17, 18, and 19 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"SEC. 23. (a) No registered closed-end company shall issue any of its securities (1) for services; or (2) for property other than cash or securities (including securities of which such registered company is the issuer), except as a dividend or distribution to its security holders or in connection with a reorganization."

Page 93, line 23, after "which", strike out "price" and insert in lieu thereof "net asset value."

Such loading may be taken by the company prior to or after the setting up of the reserve payment or payments for such year and the reserve payment or payments for such year may be graduated and adjusted to correspond with the amount of the gross payment or payments made by the certificate holder for such year less the loading so taken;"

Page 131, line 2, strike out "transaction", and in lieu thereof insert "transactions."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LANHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10065, directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

House Resolution 553, providing for the consideration of the bill, was also laid on the table.

PUBLIC HOUSING

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, delays which are holding up legislation to provide additional funds for public housing are threatening the whole national-defense program, because of imminent housing shortages in more than 150 key cities of the Nation.

Conditions in Massachusetts and other New England cities are typical examples of housing needs. Quick and decisive action must be taken by Congress to provide housing for families of defense workers or the whole defense program will be placed in jeopardy.

We have speeded up every phase of the defense program, save housing. We have authorized the expenditure of enormous sums for Army and Navy equipment, for ships, for arms and ammunition. We have set the wheels in motion to expand all our defense industries—but we have done very little to provide housing for the thousands of workers that will be needed to do the work.

A dozen cities in New England alone are desperately in need of housing right now and the situations are bound to become worse as the defense program goes forward. Here are a few examples:

Newport, R. I., with a large United States naval station and a torpedo-manufacturing industry, needs 1,800 new homes to take care of the influx of workers as a result of defense activities. The housing authority there has requested the United States Housing Authority for a loan of $1,000,000 to take care of immediate needs.

Quincy, Mass., home of the Fore River Shipyards, is now suffering a serious housing shortage, especially among the low-income groups, and officials there have indicated that 2,000 new homes will be imperative in the near future.

Pawtucket, R. I., needs 500 homes at once to provide for increased employment in eight large industrial plants within a radius of 3 miles. Five of these are now working on Government contracts and probably will triple their employment as a result of national-defense preparations.

Bath, Maine, site of another large shipyard, has no housing facilities to meet the emergency of increased employment. It is estimated that 500 new homes must be built in that area soon.

Bridgeport, Conn., which reports rapid industrial expansion, has urgently appealed to the United States Housing Authority for funds to build 400 homes at once.

Hartford, Conn., another center of defense industrial activity, faces a critical housing shortage that is steadily growing more acute. The local authority has requested Government funds to built 1,000 dwellings.

Other cities sorely needing housing for families of defense workers are Portsmouth, N. H., producer of submarines, and New Britain and New London, Conn., industrial centers for the production of defense materials.

These few cities, picked at random from many in the same condition, cannot possibly supply the necessary housing for defense workers and their families unless the Government comes to their assistance. Private building interests may help some, but the crying need of the hour is for low-rent dwellings which private enterprise so far has not been able to provide.

We have the facilities to supply all the housing that is needed in this emergency. The United States Housing Authority is set up for that purpose. It has a large and experienced staff of technicians who can step in at a moment's notice and do the job.

As a matter of fact, the United States Housing Authority already has done a splendid job with defense housing in the short time the emergency has existed and with limited funds available. Five United States Housing Authority aided defense housing projects are now under way and a dozen others will be started in the very near future.

Given the funds, the United States Housing Authority may speed the work of local authorities who are appealing for Government assistance. With 2½ years' experience in financing and supervising development of slum-clearance and low-rent housing projects, the agency is tooled to produce large-scale projects at highest possible speed.

The Government has been making extensive plans for the building of munition plants and airplane factories and placing orders with industries in communities which are without adequate housing facilities for new workers.

Unless we build houses as well as factories we must again face, as in World War years, serious delays in the production of vital defense materials.

In view of that experience, I hope we will not repeat this serious mistake but will pass the necessary legislation to hasten and facilitate the building of adequate housing for defense workers.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, several Members have asked what the program will be for the coming week. Monday is unanimous consent day, of course. I do not think there is a very long calendar.

There are two veto messages of bills which came from the Committee on the Judiciary and I understand the committee wants to have a vote on those messages. There will be 1 hour on each, of course. That will come up on Monday.

On Tuesday there will be the so-called wire-tapping bill, House Joint Resolution 571, with 1 hour of general debate. Also the bill H. R. 4366, providing for additional compensation for attorneys in the Department of Justice, with 1 hour of general debate.

There will be taken up on Wednesday the revised housing bill, for which I understand a rule will probably be granted tomorrow.

On Thursday the so-called Court of Claims, Carden, et al., bill, H. R. 7230, with reference to a bill which has been before the Court of Claims and giving them an opportunity to go to the Supreme Court, will be taken up.

Also, Senate Concurrent Resolution 40, with reference to the eradication of the fruitfly, will be taken up, with 1 hour of general debate.

That completes the program through Thursday and that is as far as the program has been planned.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is there any information as to when the Wheeler-Logan bill and the Smith amendments to the Labor Act will be back to the House from the Senate?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not informed as to just how fast the Senate will work.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and some others, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on the bill just passed may be allowed 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. RICH, and Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin were granted permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a resolution by the national committee of Young Democratic Clubs of America.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and insert a short quotation from a Kansas newspaper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the other unanimous-consent requests are granted I may address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent in connection with the general leave granted the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] to include certain excerpts in my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALLGREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address delivered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOLAND] in Scranton, Pa., last Sunday night.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein an editorial from the St. Louis Call.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the Altus Times Democrat, of Altus, Okla., on the compulsory military-training bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a table prepared for me by the Department of Agriculture, which was the basis of some of the information given during the consideration of the bill (S. 3998) increasing the capital stock of the Commodities Credit Corporation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri (at the request of Mr. ROMJUE), indefinitely, on account of death in family.

To Mr. VINCENT of Kentucky, for today, on account of official business.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is recognized for 3 minutes.

REMOVAL OF BRITISH CHILDREN

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Prime Minister Churchill has been reported in the press as being opposed to further transfer of British children to America, and quoted him as saying that such removal was "most undesirable," I want to read into the RECORD a letter I have just received from Lord Lothian, the British Ambassador.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the letter?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the letter reads as follows:

BRITISH EMBASSY,
Washington, D. C., July 30, 1940.

The Honorable HAMILTON FISH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: Mr. Eric Biddle, the secretary of the United States Committee for the Care of European Children, has suggested that I should write to you, as it has been stated that the attitude of His Majesty's Government toward the proposal to send American ships to the United Kingdom to fetch children needs clarification.

In the circumstances I am glad to inform you that if the American ships are sent to the United Kingdom to fetch children there are a large number of the children available for these ships to take back.

His Majesty's Government has decided that it cannot assume the responsibility for sending children to the North American continent in British ships unless they are convoyed. As there is a lack of convoyed British ships at present, the board is unable itself to take the responsibility for sending children to the United States. It is, however, stated that about 1,200 children are coming to this continent at their own risk, or rather that of their parents, in the next 6 weeks.

Applications to the Children's Overseas Reception Board for evacuation to the United States already exceeds 32,000, of which 10,000 are for located homes. It is estimated that the applications would reach a figure of 50,000. The great majority of these children are from homes other than those of rich parents. Ninety-eight percent of the applications are in respect to children from grant-aided schools.

I would like to thank you for your generous interest in the matter. Believe me, my dear Mr. Congressman,

Very sincerely yours,

LOTHIAN.

I am putting this letter in the RECORD merely for the information of the Members of the House. There was a good deal of dispute and misunderstanding in the Committee on Foreign Affairs as to the attitude of the British Government as a result of the statement purported to have been made by the Prime Minister of England, Mr. Churchill, in opposition to further removal of English children. It is evident from a perusal of Lord Lothian's letter that the British Government favors sending its children here, provided Americans will furnish the ships and send them over there. Such action will require the approval of Congress, and, under the terms of the bill, of all the warring nations, including England, Germany, and Italy. Every possible safeguard has been written into the Hennings bill. I hope that speedy and favorable action will be taken by the Congress to enact this humanitarian measure into law and help provide shelter and safety for these young victims of the ravages and destruction of modern warfare. [Applause.]

WESTERN HEMISPHERE UNITY

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, It was my happy privilege today to join with colleagues from the House and Senate in welcoming at the Union Station the return to the Capital City of our distinguished Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull. His success in formulating and securing the adoption at the Habana Conference of a plan for unity of action among Western Hemisphere nations adds new luster to an already distinguished career in international diplomacy. The people of America are grateful to Cordell Hull for his consistent and unselfish devotion to the cause of world peace. We realize now how fundamentally right he has always been in insisting that mutually beneficial international trade was the only foundation for enduring world peace. Napoleon pretended that his campaigns of conquest were for the purpose of preserving peace in Europe. France and Great Britain at the Versailles peace table made some concessions to the Woodrow Wilson-Cordell Hull theory of enduring peace, but not enough to insure an unshackled international trade. The German dictator, like Napoleon the Great, pretends that his objective is the peace of Europe, but if there be any in this country who still have any illusions on that subject it would pay them to read the recent book called The Voice of Destruction, the article in the August 3 issue of the Saturday Evening Post and the article in the August issue of the Reader's Digest, in which the true aims of Hitler are discussed.

During the course of the Habana Conference government officials of Germany threatened both the United States and the countries of South America. Dr. Arthur Funk, speaking for the German Government, confidently predicted German success and said that the nations of the Western Hemisphere would hereafter trade with a victorious Germany on German terms or not at all. Under the superb leadership of Secretary Hull the nations of the Western Hemisphere decided in effect to follow the Hull plan for peace and mutually profitable trade rather than the Hitler plan. The action of our Congress in supporting the Hull Reciprocal Trade Agreement Program in 1934 laid the foundation for the success of the Habana Conference.

Our exports to South American countries which modified their trade restrictions have increased 110 percent in contrast to an increase of only 64 percent to those countries which have not concluded a trade agreement with this nation. In fact, our trade in the case of two countries which have not concluded agreements has actually decreased.

The following two tables show our export trade with South America in detail.

[1] The years 1934–35 represent substantially a preagreement-year period, since only 1 agreement was in effect for the entire year 1935. During the 2-year period 1938–39 16 agreements were in effect throughout both of these years.

Source: Figures for 1934, 1935, and 1938 from Foreign Commerce and Navigation of the United States; figures for 1939 from Commerce Reports, Feb. 14, 1940, United States Department of Commerce.

The record made by the trade-agreements program in expanding and promoting the foreign commerce of the United States requires no defense. Those who examine the record in a spirit prompted by a desire to discover the truth and to appraise the results free from partisan bias and prejudice will find that trade agreements have contributed in large measure to the movement of our products to the markets of the world in greater volume until disrupted by war conditions.

Others, prompted by considerations to promote partisan objectives, have placed statements in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from time to time containing conclusions unsupported by a full disclosure of the facts. By carefully selecting figures showing the foreign trade of the United States covering periods running for a few months duration they are able to wholly distort the real picture. Trade comparisons covering a period of only a few months prove nothing. In this connection it is interesting to note that Mr. Wendell

Willkie, in an article approving the trade-agreements program in Fortune Magazine of April 1940, realized that short-time comparisons of trade results are not particularly informative. He said:

> * * * It may be years before conclusive results can be shown. But it is inconceivable to us that prosperity can be reestablished without any foreign trade. And it seems clear that if we are to have foreign trade it must be done on a reciprocal basis. We, the most successful people in the world at business and industry, know that there are two parties to every trade, and that one cannot always profit at the expense of the other. It is of vital importance to us that the other party profit too.

In connection with Mr. Willkie's recorded support of the trade-agreements program I note from the press that George N. Peek has attempted to show Mr. Willkie "the error of his ways" on trade agreements. The New York Times of July 21, in reporting Mr. Peek's interview with Mr. Willkie, indicated that Mr. Peek read his well-known objections to the present administration's farm and trade-agreements program, for the benefit of the press, and stated:

> During the reading of these points, Mr. Willkie appeared to disagree on many of them. When Mr. Peek assailed the administration's reciprocal-trade program the nominee interrupted to remind the reporters, "This is only Mr. Peek's viewpoint." Mr. Peek nodded and replied, "I am not trying to commit you on anything, Mr. Willkie."

From this it appears that Mr. Willkie still supports the trade agreements, and that in this interview he wanted it understood that he did not agree with Mr. Peek's criticism.

At this time of uncertainty when the trade routes outside the Americas have been disrupted by war, and world events foreshadow even greater disruption to world trade, with its attendant repercussions in the United States, maintenance and expansion of our trade with our South American sister republics is of vital importance to the welfare and prosperity of the entire country.

Again I say, the Nation owes a debt of gratitude to Cordell Hull for what he accomplished at Habana. [Applause.]

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, August 5, 1940, at 12 o'clock noon.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on August 1, 1940, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 4037) to confer jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the Western District of Kentucky to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of Theodore R. Troendle, for the Dawson Springs Construction Co.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GUFFEY:

S. 4238. A bill making an appropriation to provide for filling certain abandoned coal mines located under the surface at Shenandoah, Pa.; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. GEORGE:

S. 4239. A bill to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to grant an easement in a small strip of land at Veterans' Administration facility, Los Angeles, Calif., to the county of Los Angeles, Calif., for sidewalk purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

S. 4240. A bill to authorize the sale, under the provisions of the act of March 12, 1926 (44 Stat. 203), of surplus War Department real property; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOUSE BILL PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

The bill (H. R. 10065) to provide for the registration and regulation of investment companies and investment advisers, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and ordered to be placed on the calendar.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENT FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE—AMENDMENT

Mr. MILLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9972) authorizing the improvement of certain rivers and harbors in the interest of the national defense, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ACTIVE SERVICE OF NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVE, AND RETIRED PERSONNEL—AMENDMENT

Mr. ADAMS, Mr. AUSTIN, and Mr. WAGNER each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

SELECTIVE SERVICE COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING—AMENDMENT

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, on August 1 last I submitted a proposed amendment to be offered to the military training bill to raise the base pay of soldiers from $21 to $30 a month, and to raise the other schedules accordingly. There was some mistake in the printing, and the amendment which is on the desks today carries the same schedule which is now in existence in the Army. Therefore I ask that all these amendments be gathered up from the desks; and I shall offer another amendment in order to have the schedule correctly printed, and ask that it be placed on the desks instead of the ones that are now on the desks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE NATIONAL DEFENSE—AMENDMENT

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 10263) making supplemental appropriations for the national defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place in the bill, to insert the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, in his discretion, to construct housing and other structures of a permanent character within the limitations of appropriated funds in any case where such construction, in his opinion, is required in the interest of national defense."

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. GUFFEY, Mr. LEE, Mr. WILEY, and Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado each submitted an amendment, and Mr.

MALONEY submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute, intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to Senate bill 4164, the compulsory military training bill, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed.

The amendment provides that persons inducted into the land or naval forces of the United States pursuant to the act shall not be employed beyond the limits of the Western Hemisphere, except in the Territories and possessions of the United States, including the Philippine Islands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will lie on the table and be printed.

DAY OF PRAYER

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, whether men are acting as individuals or as component parts of a nation, whenever they find that their problems, because of being numerous or difficult or intricate, are hard of solution, they are prone—and I think personally properly prone—to turn to some surer source of judgment for aid and guidance.

I have noted within the past few days that Cardinal Hinsley, of the Catholic hierarchy of Great Britain, has addressed a proclamation to the Catholic people of the dominions calling for a day of petition and supplication.

I find also that during the dark days of 1863 a distinguished Senator from Iowa, Senator James Harlan, offered a resolution in the Senate calling upon President Lincoln to designate such a day.

I find also that President Wilson, in response to a request, issued such a proclamation.

I find that our distinguished President at the present time, in a recent radio address, expressed himself as being dependent on a higher source, and asking the people to cooperate with him in supplication and petition.

With these controlling precedents, I am induced to offer a resolution along these lines, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD for the information of Senators and to lie over under the rule.

The resolution (S. Res. 293) was ordered to lie over under the rule, as follows:

Whereas the Senate of the United States on March 3, 1863, passed a resolution requesting President Lincoln, by proclamation, to set apart a day for national prayer and humiliation, in view of the critical situation then confronting our war-torn Nation, and President Lincoln, in response to this request, appointed such a date of prayer for the Nation; and

Whereas President Wilson, during the crisis of the World War, likewise appointed a day for national prayer and supplication; and

Whereas, following the observance of these days of national divine petition, there were manifest outpourings of God's blessings on the Nation; and

Whereas President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, in an address to the joint session of the Congress on September 21, 1939, stated that the situation of recent weeks carried a trend to a condition which "relegates religion, democracy, and good faith among nations to the background where there could be no place for the ideals of the Prince of Peace"; and

Whereas President Roosevelt, in an address to the American people on May 26, 1940, stated that "day and night I pray for the restoration of peace in this mad world of ours. I am certain that out of the hearts of every man, woman, and child in this land in every waking minute a supplication goes up to Almighty God; that all of us beg that suffering and starving, that death and destruction may end, and that peace may return to the world. In common affection for all mankind your prayers join with mine that God will heal the wounds and hurts of humanity": Therefore be it

Resolved, That in the situation we are now facing, imperiling as it does both the spiritual and democratic ideals of our own Nation and of other nations as well, we respectfully request the President of the United States, by proclamation, to appoint a day of prayer on behalf of our Nation, a day for confession of our national offenses, and for petitioning the Source of All Wisdom for the guidance and protection of our Nation in this crisis period, and that He may point the way to thought and action that will secure for our own country and all humanity the blessings of peace and liberty under law.

JAMES E. BARRY—WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS

On motion by Mr. SHEPPARD, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill (S. 2496) for the relief of James E. Barry (76th Cong., 1st sess.), be withdrawn from the files of the Senate (no adverse report having been submitted thereon).

MILITARY CONSCRIPTION—LETTER BY EX-SECRETARY WOODRING

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I present a letter from Hon. Harry H. Woodring, who for 7 years was the distinguished Secretary of War in the Cabinet of President Roosevelt. The letter deals with the problem of military conscription. It comes from one who knows. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, following the Woodring letter I ask to have published in the RECORD a sturdy interview with Raymond J. Kelly, national commander of the American Legion. The article is headed "Conscription only as last resort favored by American Legion head." I ask that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, could we have the letter from Mr. Woodring read?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have no objection if the Senator wishes it read. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS. August 1, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In answer to your inquiry on the compulsory military bill now before the Senate, I cannot see the need of compulsory military training at this time, and I should like to see the bill amended so that it does not become effective until, and after, the Chief of Staff of the United States Army has first advised the Senate in writing that the voluntary system has completely broken down. The voluntary system is traditional, and I believe is an important factor in the American way of free government as is free speech, the will to worship God as one's own conscience dictates, free assembly, and other American principles. If, through the influence of increasing tendency toward paternalism, we have broken down the moral stamina and fiber of the American youth, and made him a regimented atom, rather than a free individual, and thereby broken down the voluntary instinct to serve in a patriotic way, we then unquestionably will have to adopt a compulsory system for the defense of this country. But we must be assured when we adopt the compulsory system that we have unquestionably left the American principle based on the individual's freedom of action and have adopted a bill that smacks of totalitarianism.

I believe it is the duty of Congress, and particularly the Senate, to be certain that the voluntary system has not failed for these reasons, but because it has had disadvantages for which our Government itself is to blame. For instance several years ago, and also several months ago, I proposed to the administration the increase of the basic pay of the enlisted soldier of the United States Army from $21 to $30. The reply was that it was inconsistent with the financial program of the Administration. Whether that inconsistency holds good today, I would be willing for the Senate to decide. I believe the voluntary system is at a great disadvantage. We go out over the country and propose to the American youth that he enlist in the Army for a period of 3 years at $21 per month basic pay. That young man knows that 95 percent of such enlisted men receive the $21 per month during the full 3 year period. And he also knows that the youth that enlist at the same time in the United States Navy at $21 basic pay is advanced in grade, through their custom, approved by, and money appropriated therefor by the the Congress of the United States—is advanced within 60 or 90 days to $30, and in many instances soon thereafter to $36 per month. In fact there is a letter addressed to Chairman SHEPPARD, bearing my signature, before the Senate Military Affairs Committee, written only 6 or 7 months ago, bearing fully on this question of inequality of pay between the two services. I have not the figures before me, but I believe it is safe to say that within a year over 66⅔ percent of the youth that enlist in the United States Navy receive over $30 per month or more.

The same youth that is asked to join the Army at $21 pay for 3 years sees his neighbor join the C. C. C. for 1 year at $30 per month, and in many instances the C. C. C. camp and the Army post are side by side. How any fair-minded Member of Congress could say that we have given the voluntary system of enlistment for the United States Army service a fair trial, and that it has broken down, and therefore we need the compulsory service, is beyond my understanding.

I also think the Senate should ask if our present quota of enlistments, as outlined by the War Department, have failed to be reached in any instance. Perhaps we of the War Department several months ago did not place the quota high enough. That is not the fault of the voluntary system. If we need a million, or two million, young men for trained service in the United States Army, let's first give equal advantages to the voluntary system of raising this quota, and if necessary let's provide for 1 year voluntary service at $30 per month. I am for a trial by voluntary system before changing to the compulsory system. If the voluntary system fails, then I will join with others in obtaining the number of men, in the necessary time to defend this country, through a compulsory system.

Thanking you for your inquiry, and with continued good wishes, I am

Yours sincerely,

HARRY H. WOODRING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the interview presented by the Senator from Michigan will be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONSCRIPTION ONLY AS LAST RESORT FAVORED BY AMERICAN LEGION HEAD

KELLY PROPOSES CALL FOR MILLION VOLUNTEERS FOR YEAR'S TRAINING—DEPLORES PROPAGANDA TO GET UNITED STATES IN EUROPE'S WAR

(By Nathan Oatis)

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., August 2.—Raymond J. Kelly, husky National Commander of the American Legion, said in an interview today he favored conscription only as a last resort—and then an all-inclusive conscription.

Kelly, a lawyer who is 45, but looks much younger in spite of gray, curly hair, sat in shirt sleeves in his office at national headquarters here and talked about war and preparedness.

"We are not at war," he said, "although everything that is being done seems to be based on the theory that we are, or that we will be any moment.

"The provisions of the Burke-Wadsworth bill should not be put into effect," he said, "until all other avenues have been exhausted."

This bill originally provided for registration of all men between 18 and 64 for "selective compulsory military training and service," but the age limits have been reduced to 21 to 31 by the Senate Military Affairs Committee.

FOR MILLION VOLUNTEERS

In place of conscription the Legion commander proposed a call for a million volunteers for a year's training.

"I believe the response," he said, "would be tremendous." And he pointed out it took only a few days to get 50,000 student pilots for so-called Plattsburgs of the air.

In event of war, Kelly said, business and industry as well as men, should be drafted, and "all elements of the Nation should serve equally."

He recalled the Legion for 20 years had proposed such a system in resolutions for "universal selective service."

Kelly deplored propaganda he said was being spread in an effort to get the United States to send troops to the European war.

"It is not our war that is being fought in Europe," he said. "Some people are endeavoring to make it our war. But while we naturally sympathize with those who are resisting aggression and force, we cannot be the policemen of the world."

Americans should "think of our own country first, and be prepared to defend our own interests in our own hemisphere."

NOT PREPARED NOW

This country is not prepared now for its own defense, he said, and added he didn't know whether President Roosevelt's arms program would prepare it adequately, because "I have not been able to learn the complete details of what he intends.

"With all the facilities we possess," Kelly continued, "it will take from a year to two years to have anything like the proper defense forces. And, of course, we could build up our own forces more rapidly and completely if we do not send essential equipment to belligerents."

He did not criticize this policy, but expressed belief it should be carried out with care "so as not to strip our own forces of badly needed equipment."

Kelly said the United States needs an army of 1,000,000 trained men, fully mechanized, beside National Guard and organized Reserves; a navy "second to none, capable of operating in both oceans against any possible grouping of aggressors," and "the largest air force in the world."

"If we can build up the kind of defense we need," he said, "our very strength may save us from war."

Kelly, a Republican, was corporation counsel in Detroit's nonpartisan city administration before he became head of the Legion last September.

ADDRESS BY GENERAL PERSHING ON COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, last evening Gen. John J. Pershing delivered over a national radio hook-up an interesting address touching, among others, on the question of compulsory military training. As one who served with General Pershing in France, I have the utmost confidence in the general's views on this important subject, and I am sure the American people have.

I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the body of the RECORD, immediately following my remarks, the speech of General Pershing delivered last evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

Fellow citizens, I am speaking tonight because I consider it my duty. It is my duty to tell you that in my opinion we face problems of the utmost seriousness, and all the things we hold most dear are gravely threatened.

I must tell you that we can defend them only if we make up our minds now to speak the truth without concealment; if we make up our minds to face the truth without flinching; if we make up our minds to act upon the truth without hesitating.

I think you will believe me when I say that no war was ever prevented by hiding the danger and by arguing that the danger does not exist.

The men who are best qualified to know what is going on in Europe and in Asia and in this hemisphere, the men whose business it is to know the facts, are very nearly unanimous in believing what I am saying to you tonight.

A grave danger for us lurks in the present world situation. So the time has come when we must rise up as a united people to make secure our country's independence and our great inheritance of constitutional liberty.

SEES DISASTER IN APPEASEMENT

More than half the world is ruled by men who despise the American idea and have sworn to destroy it. They know that while one great people remains independent and free because it is strong and is brave they can never crush finally the people they have conquered. The example of liberty here will always continue to inspire the resistance to tyranny over there.

They are fanatical and they are strong; they are efficient and they are ruthless. Eight nations have tried to appease them. The appeasers of eight nations are dead or in jail or discredited and ruined. In seven of these eight nations the appeasers who would not take the danger seriously, who would not prepare when there was still time, have led their countries into disaster.

It is not hysterical to insist that democracy and liberty are threatened. With democracy and liberty overthrown on the Continent of Europe, only the British are left to defend democracy and liberty in Europe.

By sending help to the British, we can still hope with confidence to keep the war on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean, where the enemies of liberty, if possible, should be defeated. But some are bold about what they would do tomorrow if Great Britain is defeated and the war comes to this hemisphere. I say to you solemnly that today may be forever too late to keep war from the Americas. Today may be the last time when, by measures short of war, we can still prevent war.

MEET FORCE WITH STRONGER FORCE

We must be ready to meet force with a stronger force. We must make ourselves strong by building up our Army and Navy and the establishment of the principle of universal selective service, which means merely that the men needed are chosen by lot.

And I am telling you tonight, because it is my duty to warn you before it is too late, that the British Navy needs destroyers and small craft to convoy merchant ships, to escort its warships and hunt submarines, and to repel invasion.

We have an immense reserve of destroyers left over from the other war and in a few months the British will be completing a large number of destroyers of their own. The most critical time therefore is the next few weeks or months. If there is anything we can do to save the British Fleet during that time, we shall be failing in our duty to America if we do not do it.

If a proper method can be found, America will safeguard her freedom and security by making available to the British or Canadian Government at least 50 of the over-age destroyers which are left from the days of the World War. If the destroyers help save the British Fleet, they may save us from the danger and hardship of another war.

Americans should not shrink from duty because of probable hazards. I know that many sincere patriots are frightened at the thought of even the smallest act because they think such acts would lead us closer to the day when another American expeditionary force sets sail for Europe.

OPPOSES EXPEDITIONARY FORCE

It is my opinion that in this war it would be absolute folly even to consider sending another expeditionary force. No one is considering it and those who may say that anyone is considering it are deceiving themselves and deceiving you.

We must have the strength of character to face the truth. Foremost among the truths which we will ignore at our peril is that the time needed to build our own defenses may be lengthened if we have the courage to make the small but important contribution which is still within our power toward the sustaining of the British defense.

A new kind of war is loose in the world, fought with all weapons, including treason—fought most insidiously during what some of our countrymen call peacetime. It is a war against a civilization that we know. It is a revolution against the values which we have cherished and which we wish our children to cherish in the future. It is a revolution which denies the dignity of man and which banishes the hope of brotherhood and comradeship on earth.

We can see it developing right before our very eyes. It must be faced with daring and with devotion. We must lift up our hearts. We must reaffirm our noble traditions and make ourselves so strong that the traditions we live by shall not perish from the earth.

I thank you.

VICE PRESIDENT JOHN N. GARNER

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, several days ago I wrote a letter to the Vice President of the United States. I have been asked by several persons to insert it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In the absence of objection I should like to read the letter. It is very short:

AUGUST 2, 1940.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
Uvalde, Tex.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It has been kind of lonesome and strange around the Senate the last 2 weeks, just because you haven't been around. When I rise to address the Chair and you are not there, and I don't see you around the cloakrooms or lobby, there is a sort of a vacancy.

It isn't just because you are the Vice President of the United States. It isn't because you have been around here so long, but it is because it is you we are missing. Out in my State of Wisconsin, as I told you once, there are a lot of political kinfolks of yours. They may not be sailing under the same political flag, but they kind of think the way you do. They are squareshooters. They are on the level. They aren't just politicians. They are big-hearted, big-minded, gentle folks with ideals and purposes—folks who if they were representing a commonwealth or the Nation would not represent a class but would represent all the people; who like you, would not hesitate to damn or criticize "wrong" wherever it was found and who would praise a "right" wherever it was found.

I have never had the privilege of getting close to you, so that I felt I could call you Jack. To me you were always "Mr. President," but there was something warm about you, something genuine. Besides that you were always peppy, had a smile, and as you passed through our Senate reading room with the cigar in your mouth you generally had a story, an amusing incident to tell.

So, Mr. President, won't you come back? I believe the country needs you here. It needs your sense of balance, of judgment, of common sense, and some of us would feel just a little surer, a little more safe, and far more happy if you would just come back.

With kindest regards to you and Mrs. Garner (we need her here, too—you both make a great team), I remain,

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER WILEY.

Since that letter was written, Mr. President, there was called to my attention an article by Raymond Moley entitled "Mr. GARNER's Silence," published in Newsweek of August 5. I ask that the article be printed at the conclusion of my remarks. I desire to read from the article just a paragraph or two. It begins:

If tears were shed by any of Vice President GARNER's friends as he left Washington last week they should have been tears of regret over what they had done to themselves at Chicago the week before, and not tears for him. "Daughters of Jerusalem, * * * weep for yourselves," he might have told them. For Mr. GARNER leaves with his laurels, his conscience, and the assurance that he closes the books of official life with his principles unimpaired.

One of these principles is that men clothed with official power must be controlled by law and custom. This Mr. GARNER learned from watching the comings and goings of public figures for 37 years in Washington. Another principle is that such a government as ours is obligated to represent all the people—not just a part of them. Mr. GARNER was against special privilege for anybody. And when he said "anybody" he meant "anybody." He meant not only businessmen but C. I. O. sit-down strikers. He also believed that Presidential discretion in spending billions of dollars of public money was a means of perpetuating one regime in office. He opposed it in vain. He saw in Chicago the result he had predicted.

The article concludes:

If this be Mr. GARNER's retirement from public life, it is a retirement magnificently earned. He has been the Senate's greatest presiding officer. Tradition barred him from debate, and Mr. GARNER respects tradition. But by sheer force of character, by repeated demonstrations of shrewd judgment, he became the strongest figure on Capitol Hill. It will be many a year before his equal is found.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in full at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

PERSPECTIVE—MR. GARNER'S SILENCE

(By Raymond Moley)

If tears were shed by any of Vice President GARNER's friends as he left Washington last week, they should have been tears of regret over what they had done to themselves at Chicago, the week before, and not tears for him. "Daughters of Jerusalem * * * weep for yourselves," he might have told them. For Mr. GARNER leaves with his laurels, his conscience, and the assurance that he closes the books of official life with his principles unimpaired.

One of these principles is that men clothed with official power must be controlled by law and custom. This Mr. GARNER learned from watching the comings and goings of public figures for 37 years in Washington. Another principle is that such a government as ours is obligated to represent all the people—not just a part of them. Mr. GARNER was against special privilege for anybody. And when he said "anybody," he meant "anybody." He meant not only businessmen but C. I. O. sit-down strikers. He also believed that Presidential discretion in spending billions of dollars of public money was a means of perpetuating one regime in office. He opposed it in vain. He saw, in Chicago, the result he had predicted.

Mr. GARNER has chosen to register his disapproval by maintaining silence. Why, it may be asked, should Mr. GARNER limit his disapproval to that? Why just silence? The answer is that a man like Mr. GARNER has a profound belief in party loyalty. The average man does not feel it with anything like the passion of a GARNER. The average man, though he may consider himself a regular Democrat or a regular Republican, can conceive of circumstances in which he'd cast his vote for the opposition party. Mr. GARNER could not. Outright bolting of his party by a man of his background he would consider apostasy. He could forgive it in others, but never in himself. Silence is the limit of his disapproval. But that is why his silence is so ominous. It is the supreme expression of his condemnation. It carries more conviction than the speeches of many men.

By the same token, it is more terrifying to those who conceived the "draft." They know how potent can be the silent treatment administered not only by GARNER but by thousands of other Democrats. It is a rebellion by passive resistance. It cannot be fought directly. It cannot be answered. Words do not answer silence. It means that many candidates on the Democratic ticket in the cities, counties, and States will go through the campaign discussing all issues but one, and all names but two. It means that countless party workers can go through the motions of working for the national ticket but convey no conviction and influence no votes. It means that the little group of favorites who encouraged the "draft" movement against the better judgment of veteran Democrats can entreat until they are blue in the face without ever getting more than the semblance of united party action. It means that the draft-Roosevelt engineers are dealing with men who have lived through political defeat as well as political victory—men who believe that defeat can be survived if principle is kept inviolate. That is what silence can mean. That is what Mr. GARNER's silence means.

If this be Mr. GARNER's retirement from public life, it is a retirement magnificently earned. He has been the Senate's greatest presiding officer. Tradition barred him from debate, and Mr. GARNER respects tradition. But by sheer force of character, by repeated demonstrations of shrewd judgment, he became the strongest figure on Capitol Hill. It will be many a year before his equal is found.

ISSUANCE OF CURRENCY AGAINST GOLD AND SILVER STOCKS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the question is often asked why the Government does not issue currency against its gold and silver stocks, instead of raising money by taxation and borrowing. It occurred to me that it would be useful at this time to have an authentic statement made on the subject. The Treasury Department has done so in a letter to me from the Under Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Bell. I think it would be worth while to have it printed in the body of the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 30, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This is in further reply to your letter of June 11, 1940, enclosing an inquiry from Mr. and Mrs. Wesley Reid, 9974 Littlefield Street, Detroit, Mich., and requesting a statement in answer to inquiries asking why the Government does not issue additional currency against its gold and silver stocks instead of raising money by taxation and borrowing.

The monetary gold stock of the United States constitutes an integral part of our monetary system. Gold certificates and credits payable in gold certificates, amounting to $18,100,000,000, have been issued to the Federal Reserve banks. These certificates are the principal assets of the 12 Federal Reserve banks, which have deposit liabilities to member banks of approximately $13,900,000,000 and outstanding Federal Reserve notes of $5,200,000,000. The deposit liabilities of the Federal Reserve banks, in turn, constitute the reserves which member banks maintain against their deposit liabilities, now amounting to roughly $50,000,000,000.

To be sure, the Government is authorized to issue additional amounts of other kinds of United States currency, but one important objection to issuing money in order to pay for expenditures in excess of receipts is that bank reserves would be further increased. Currency in excess of what the public chooses to hold for cash transactions is usually deposited in banks. The deposit of such currency increases banks' reserves, which are available for a multiple expansion of bank credit. Member banks of the Federal Reserve System now have well over $6,000,000,000 of reserves in excess of legal requirements, and the problem of coping with excess reserves at some future time would be greatly augmented by large additional issues of currency, if such issues were unrelated to a desire on the part of the public to convert bank deposits into currency.

Moreover, the very announcement of the intention to issue additional United States currency might arouse fears of inflation and lead to a type of speculation that would be highly undesirable. To many persons, resort to the issue of paper money to meet Government expenditures might signify both an absence of restraint upon future Government expenditures and an inability to raise funds by other means.

In view of the fact that the Government can now borrow at the lowest rates in history and that such borrowing does not entail the above-mentioned disadvantages, the saving in interest cost to be gained by issuing currency would not appear to offset the disadvantages involved.

Mr. and Mrs. Reid's postal card is returned herewith.

Very truly yours,

D. W. BELL,
Under Secretary of the Treasury.

ACTIVE SERVICE OF NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVE, AND RETIRED PERSONNEL

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The routine morning business is closed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 2094, Senate Joint Resolution 286.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair suggest to the Senator from Texas that that cannot be reached by a motion at this time. If unanimous consent is given, it can be done. Otherwise the calendar will be called.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the calling of the calendar be dispensed with. I thought that when the Chair announced that the morning business was closed that covered the calling of the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the call of the calendar be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 286.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of Reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, there is a matter which I wish to discuss for just a few moments, as I think it is of more or less importance at this particular time. I refer to a recent opinion issued by the counsel for the Republican National Committee on the act just recently passed by the Congress and signed by the President relating to certain political activities. The opinion deals almost altogether with the matter of campaign contributions, and it is upon the provisions of the bill itself, and also the opinion, that I desire to speak for a few moments today.

Senators will recall that during the debate in the Senate of the measure seeking to restrain certain political activities the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] offered an amendment limiting campaign contributions to $5,000. There was no doubt at all as to what that provision meant, there was no doubt as to what the Senator from Alabama had in mind when the amendment was offered, and there was no doubt about it being the will of the Senate that the amendment be adopted as it was drawn, because, as I recall, we had a record vote on that particular amendment. I myself voted against it, although I stated at the time that I favored the principle, but I was afraid it would act to kill the entire measure.

It is hereby declared to be a pernicious political activity, and it shall hereafter be unlawful, for any person, directly or indirectly, to make contributions in an aggregate amount in excess of $5,000, during any calendar year, or in connection with any campaign for nomination or election, to or on behalf of any candidate for an elective Federal office (including the offices of President of the United States and Presidential and Vice Presidential electors), or to or on behalf of any committee or other organization engaged in furthering, advancing, or advocating the nomination or election of any candidate for any such office or the success of any national political party.

In substance, that was exactly the way the amendment was drafted by the Senator from Alabama and the way it passed the Senate. It was not changed in the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, but on the 10th of July, Mr. VREELAND, of New Jersey, offered the following amendment, which was adopted on the floor of the House without debate, but there was a division, and I think the vote was 93 to 74. The amendment reads:

This subsection shall not apply to contributions made to or by a State or local committee or other State or local organization.

It is not my purpose today to discuss that particular exemption or my own interpretation of it. It might mean many things. For instance, it might well apply to committees which existed at the time of the passage of the measure. There are many things which might be involved. But the thing I particularly desire to discuss is the advice and the interpretation which has been given by the counsel for the Republican National Committee, Mr. Fletcher. I have his opinion here as reported in the New York Times of yesterday. Mr. Fletcher said:

As counsel for the Republican National Committee, I had a conference with several prominent lawyers regarding the effect of the Hatch Act upon the Republican campaign. The act has now been signed by the President in the form in which it passed both Houses of Congress. At that conference we came to certain conclusions which I herewith embody in an opinion to you.

We believe that section 13 of the act—

does not prohibit the giving of subscriptions up to the limit authorized by the act, that is, $5,000, to each of several candidates.

Mr. President, I cannot understand that interpretation at all. The act, according to Mr. Fletcher—and these are his words—would not "prohibit the giving of subscriptions up to the limit authorized by the act" provided "they are maintaining separate campaigns or separate campaign committees."

I am not casting any undue reflection upon anyone, but when one seeks to interpret a law and find out what it means, why is it necessary to point out how the law can be violated, or at least its principle avoided?

Mr. BARKLEY. Has the Senator seen the letter or statement issued by the Attorney General, which appears in today's papers?

Mr. HATCH. I have it here, and shall ask to have it printed in the RECORD. What I am criticizing is not the interpretation so much, but it is pointed out in paragraph after paragraph in this opinion how to avoid the principle of the act. That is what I object to more than the legal conclusion.

Mr. Fletcher's opinion continued:

Obviously gifts to the Republican National Committee inure to the benefit of all Republican candidates, while a gift to an individual candidate or his committee does not benefit other candidates except indirectly and remotely.

The act, as passed, specifically provides that subsection 13A "shall not apply to contributions made to or by a State or local committee or other local organization."

That is the amendment which was placed in the section in the House, as I have just related.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think at this point it would be appropriate to point out that Mr. VREELAND, the Member of the House who offered the amendment which the counsel for the Republican National Committee says emasculates the effect of the limitation, is a member of the Republican Party.

Mr. HATCH. I have no knowledge of Mr. VREELAND'S politics.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have just examined the Congressional Directory, which is on all Senators' desks, which shows that he was elected as a Republican. He is the author of the emasculating amendment.

Mr. HATCH. The opinion continues:

The Corrupt Practices Act has always recognized an exemption for State and local committees; and evidently this sentence, which was added just before the act was passed, was intended to take out of the operation of the statute altogether State and local committees or other local organizations.

The opinion then continues:

We have no doubt that the State and local committees referred to are those that are organized wholly within a State, even though their object be, in part, the election of Federal officers. Consequently, we see no objection to any donor giving any amount he sees fit to a State or local finance or political committee. The words "or other local organization" would also cover a local group operating within a State, even though its activities sought the election of Federal officers.

It is therefore our advice that donors desiring to give more than $5,000 to Republican candidates or committees should give only one gift of $5,000 to the Republican National Committee or the Republican Senatorial Committee or the Republican Congressional Committee. Any amounts above $5,000 that a donor desires to give should be given to State or local committees.

Again we see that the Attorney General of the United States does not agree with this interpretation, as I shall presently show. The counsel for the Republican Party is pointing out directly and in words how to evade the very principle the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] fought for on the floor of the Senate and which was contained in his amendment. I ask the Senator from Alabama if I am correct in that statement?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator from New Mexico is clearly correct in his statement.

Mr. HATCH. I continue to read from the opinion by Mr. Fletcher:

You also inquired of us respecting collection of pledges made before the Hatch Act was passed where the pledges are in excess of permissible gifts under the act. Since the act defines "contribution" to include a "pledge," we think it is probably true that the collection of a pledge made before the act passed would not be a violation of the act, but if you wish to be double safe in the matter, prior pledges which would violate the act should be—

What? Pledges made to the Republican National Committee, he is talking about now, I think, but he says—

To be double safe in the matter do not carry out your pledge to the Republican committee but give it to one of the State or local committees.

That is a direct and positive recommendation that the very principle which he says is prohibited by the act, be violated.

In substance, his language is:

If you wish to be double safe in the matter, prior pledges which would violate the act should be paid to State and local committees to the extent that they exceed $5,000.

Section 20 of the Hatch Act, as passed, limits the amount that each committee may receive or expend during a calendar year or campaign to $3,000,000 and provides that subscriptions obtained with the knowledge or consent of the treasurer of the committee are deemed to have been made to that committee.

It is our opinion that the $3,000,000 limitation applies strictly to the calendar year or campaign and that the committee should regard as part of its permissible $3,000,000 the money that it has already collected or disbursed during the calendar year, notwithstanding that the act was not in force when the collections occurred.

We do not think, however, that the Republican National Committee is required to include in its collections money that it caused to be paid directly to State or other committees prior to the passage of the act.

The set-up which you had planned prior to the passage of the Hatch Act contemplated that all subscriptions would be made to the national committee—

Now that had already been planned. That plan had been made, that all subscriptions should be paid to the national committee, and that the funds should be distributed to the States from and through the national committee.

It is obvious—

Says Mr. Fletcher—

that such a procedure will result in reducing the $3,000,000 limit for each committee, because money passing through the hands of a committee will be deemed to be a part of its permissible $3,000,000.

We therefore recommend—

Now this is a recommendation—that you discontinue the plan you now have and have all solicitations made by State or local finance committees.

A plan had already been set up that all contributions should be made to the national committee. If that plan is carried into effect and the sum expended exceeds the limit fixed by Congress, the letter of the act would be violated; therefore Mr. Fletcher recommends that the original plan of making contributions to the national committee be abandoned and contributions be made through the local committees. What for?

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a very brief statement?

Mr. HATCH. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GILLETTE. In connection with the matter that the Senator from New Mexico is discussing so forcefully, I may make this statement on behalf of the special committee which has been clothed by the Senate with certain powers, and charged with certain duties in connection with this same matter. We have considered the matter to which the Senator has been referring. Until the question has been adjudicated we are not following the opinion, the advisory or off the record opinion, of anyone, but the committee is proceeding on the theory and from the position that the Congress in establishing this limitation and prohibiting contributions, direct or indirect, over a certain limitation, had a definite purpose, and we are not being party to any evasion of that purpose by any party or any national or local committee. That is the theory on which we are proceeding until there is an adjudication made in the courts.

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate the statement made by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. HATCH. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There will be a great many thoroughly conscientious citizens who, like myself, completely subscribe to the theory of the Hatch Act, who will want as authentic information as possible as to what their rights and privileges are, and I should like to ask the Senator if I understand him correctly that it is his interpretation of the act that the $3,000,000 limitation applies to the national campaign, plus the sum total of all 48 State campaigns?

Mr. HATCH. I have not been trying to give my own interpretation of the act, and I have not been discussing the legal opinion expressed by Mr. Fletcher. Technically and legally he may be absolutely correct, although I have my doubts about that subject. The point I am trying to make is the obvious evasion of the law attempted in this opinion, as it appears to me. I will tell the Senate what I am advising. I had a discussion with Colonel Halsey last week about what attitude Senators should take in their campaigns. My advice is to resolve every doubt in favor of every principle of the act. That is the way to proceed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I certainly agree with the Senator from New Mexico in that matter.

Mr. HATCH. But instead of resolving every doubt in favor of the act, it seems to me everything has been resolved against the act, and the effort made to find a method of getting around it. Under Mr. Fletcher's interpretation, each committee is advised it can spend $3,000,000.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But still I come back to the question which will bother everybody, as we, in good faith, contemplate this problem.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it would have been the finest thing in the world, and I would have taken the floor in commendation of him, if Mr. Fletcher had said "Heretofore we have laid out our plan that all campaign contributions shall go through the National Committee, and under the law which Congress has passed, $3,000,000 is all that committee can spend. We are going to obey that law, and we will let our gifts come through the Republican National Committee, and keep them within the $3,000,000 limitation." That would have been a splendid, fine thing for our country. But, instead of that, he tells members of his party, in effect, to give $3,000,000 to every State and local committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So far as the Senator's discussion of evasion is concerned, it would seem to me that Mr. Willkie himself has given very substantial evidence of a purpose and desire to come under the spirit as well as the letter of the law.

Mr. HATCH. I was highly gratified when immediately after his nomination he made a statement that the $5,000 limitation would be adhered to.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Precisely.

Mr. HATCH. He said something to that effect. But Mr. Fletcher was in Colorado Springs with Mr. Willkie, I understand, when this statement was issued.

Mr. WAGNER. And after a conference.

Mr. HATCH. And it was issued after a conference, a Senator suggests on the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There is nothing to indicate that the opinion is binding on Mr. Willkie, or that he has gone back on his avowed purpose; but does the Senator still say that the $3,000,000 total limitation includes all 48 State campaigns as well as the national campaign?

Mr. HATCH. I have not gotten down really to studying what the correct legal interpretation is. I am going to do it. I hope that what I have said will be the result. It may not be. It may be that technically Mr. Fletcher is absolutely correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is not prepared to make a statement on that subject now.

Mr. HATCH. I did not intend to discuss that point at all. It is the apparent evasion of the principle of the law that I am discussing, and that is far more important to me than the technical language and discussion of the act.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator will bear in mind that I stood by him in the Senate in his fight for this measure.

Mr. HATCH. I think the Senator from Wisconsin on every occasion voted in favor of the measure.

Mr. WILEY. I not only spoke on behalf of it, but worked on behalf of it. I am sure that the Senator does not want to be unfair in any statement he has made.

Mr. HATCH. I hope I have not been unfair.

Mr. WILEY. I think there is an implication in a portion of his statement which savors of unfairness. Let me call the Senator's attention to a situation that has existed in relation to the Republican Party. We have 48 States, and we have Territories. As I understand—though I was not the beneficiary of the fund in my campaign—when, for instance, the party would collect, say in a given State, $40,000 or $50,000 for the campaign in the State, it would involve the candidates for Governor, Representative, and other offices. That would be paid into the treasury of the Republican Party, and 80 percent of that would go back to the committee in the State. Consequently, as I understood, the $3,000,000 limitation applied to the Presidential election and not to the election of Governors or Representatives or Senators. That is what I think the Senator from Michigan was getting at.

Mr. Fletcher made the statement—and I hold no brief for him, because I do not know him—that the States would have to clear through their own committees. It is absolutely imperative for physical and financial reasons that that be done. If we take 48 States and if we apply the limit of $3,000,000 to 48 States, applicable to all Senators and Representatives, Democrats and Republicans, who are running for office, Governors who are running for office, and officials of the States who are running for office, of course we could not get anywhere. Consequently, Mr. Fletcher recognizes the $3,000,000 limit applying to the Presidential election and Vice Presidential election, but says in substance, as I understood from what the Senator read, that the States have to conduct their own compaigns now without the funds coming through the Democratic Committee or the Republican Committee.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HATCH. I should like first to reply to the Senator from Wisconsin. In all the debate we have had on the subject in the Senate, I have never laid at the door of the Republican Party any charge which I have not also laid at the door of the Democratic Party.

Mr. WILEY. Say that loud, so that those in the galleries may hear. [Laughter.]

Mr. HATCH. I thought we had all been equally guilty, and I hoped this law would be a step away from our equal guilt. I was extremely disappointed when I read the opinion of the counsel of the Republican National Committee, not, as I say, because of his technical reasoning, but because of the apparent purpose.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I now yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. I merely wish to observe that perhaps Mr. Willkie's right hand does not know what his left hand doeth. It remains to be seen whether or not Mr. Willkie cares. Perhaps Mr. Willkie is to play the part of Mr. Purity in politics, while Mr. Fletcher will play Mr. Practical.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MINTON. The Senator will remember that I was not for his bill; but, of course, the Senator from Wisconsin and all the other Republicans were for it. I told them that as soon as it was passed the Republicans would be trying to dodge it.

Mr. WILEY. I have no recollection of the Senator from Indiana saying that the Republicans would try to dodge it. I may say that, being from Indiana, the Senator knows just how the thing is done. [Laughter.]

Mr. HATCH. The opinion proceeds:

Subscriptions up to $5,000 may be paid either to the Republican Congressional Committee, the Republican Senatorial Committee, or the Republican National Committee. All amounts over $5,000 should be paid to State and local committees.

Just to be sure, again, that the law is evaded, I assume.

Each of these committees can pay to the national committee such part of its collections as it sees fit to do without violating section 13a of the act, and in this manner each committee will have its own $3,000,000 limitation.

If that is not a perfect blueprint of how to evade the act, I never saw one.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. What does the Senator from New Mexico think the Republican Party wants with a general counsel if a part of his duty is not to keep them out of jail? [Laughter.]

Mr. HATCH. I have always found that a lawyer's best advice to his client, if he wants to keep him out of jail, is not to violate the law, rather than to hunt some circuitous route around the law, because I have known very able lawyers to be mistaken in advising their clients to follow circuitous routes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Usually the lawyer who receives the largest pay is the one who successfully shows his clients a circuitous route around the law.

Mr. HATCH. We have not yet reached the gem of this opinion. Here it is:

Procedure for State groups. In order that there may be no doubt that the State and local committees come within the exception in the act—

He has said that they are not included in the act, but to be doubly sure, and to be certain that they may have contributions in excess of $5,000, and that each committee may have its own $3,000,000, this advise is given—

we think that they should be entirely divorced from the Republican National Committee and should operate by authorization of the respective State committees.

The existing Republican National Finance Committee may continue to function, giving advice and counsel, and will be in constant touch with State and local committees. It should not do solicitation for State and local committees or have detailed knowledge of their subscriptions.

In other words, "Boys, go out and get all the money you can, but don't let us know anything about it."

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Is the divorce a divorce from bed and board, or is it absolute? [Laughter.]

Mr. HATCH. Reading further from the opinion:

You also stated to us that there was a possibility that an independent Willkie-McNary committee might be formed to solicit and disburse funds for the election of Mr. Willkie and Mr. McNary, unconnected with the Republican National Committee.

It is our opinion that donations to such a committee would not have to be included in the Republican National Committee's limitation of $3,000,000, if such Willkie-McNary committee is independently organized and does not consist of members of the Republican National Committee.

This is a perfect plan laid out and designed to evade and avoid a law passed in utmost good faith by the Congress of the United States. I am glad, Mr. President, that only recently Colonel Halsey, the Secretary of the Senate, saw fit to circulate to Governors and secretaries of the several States, candidates for election to Federal offices, and other persons in interest the following letter:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

To Governors and Secretaries of the Several States, Candidates for Election to Federal Offices, and Other Persons in Interest:

The Congress of the United States passed two laws, which the President of the United States approved, relating to political activities. These laws affect certain Federal and State officers, employees, and agencies and political subdivisions in connection with an election for the office of President, Vice President, electors for President and Vice President, United States Senators and Representatives in Congress, Delegates, and Commissioners from the Territories and insular possessions.

These acts were passed during the first and third sessions of the Seventy-sixth Congress, were approved on August 2, 1939, and July 19, 1940, respectively, and are known as (the Hatch Acts) Public Laws Nos. 252 and 753 of the Seventy-sixth Congress, and are additional to provisions in the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 (S. Doc. No. 264).

Certain limitations are also imposed on contributions in connection with any campaign for nomination or election to or on behalf of such cadidates and national political parties.

Your attention is respectfully called to these laws, with the request that the names of candidates for the office of the United States Senator from your State, with their addresses, be furnished, so that their attention may be called to these laws in preparing their returns of contributions and expenditures as required by the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, which returns shall under law be filed with the Secretary of the United States Senate.

EDWIN A. HALSEY, Secretary.

Colonel Halsey had the forethought merely to call the provisions of the law to the attention of everybody affected. He did not think it was necessary to advise how the law could be evaded.

Immediately upon the issuance of the interpretation of this act by Mr. Fletcher, the Attorney General of the United States had this to say:

My attention is called to the published opinion of Henry P. Fletcher, Counsel for the Republican National Committee, interpreting provisions of the Hatch Act which were intended to place limitations on campaign contributions and expenditures.

It is stated to be his opinion that these limitations are avoidable by subdividing contributions, such as dividing contributions between different candidates on the same ticket—

Mr. Fletcher does so advise—dividing them between the national committee and various local committees even though engaged in promoting the same national ticket—

Mr. Fletcher does so advise—and by dividing them between campaign clubs and special committees and the regular national committee—

Which Mr. Fletcher did advise, although he stated that prior to the passage of the act the plan had been that all contributions should go through the national committee.

The Department of Justice will not render advisory interpretations of the Hatch Act or of other laws for political parties or others. But silence in the face of the widely published opinion of Mr. Fletcher might mislead well-intentioned persons to believe it to be an accepted interpretation of the Hatch Act.

Hence it is fair to state now that no plan of this nature for avoiding the limitation of the Hatch Act is accepted or approved by the Department of Justice.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me give a personal example to demonstrate the difficulty of the situation which the Senator presents.

I am a candidate this fall for reelection to the Senate from Michigan. Does the Senator say that the expenditures which I make in my campaign must fall within the limit of $3,000,000 which is defined in the Hatch Act? How in the world am I to know and how can I be advised as to whether or not I am within the $3,000,000 limitation?

Mr. HATCH. I am quite sure the Senator will have no trouble on that point. The act itself speaks very clearly about it. I do not now have the exact section before me.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, does not the act provide that it does not repeal the Corrupt Practices Act?

Mr. HATCH. It does not repeal the Corrupt Practices Act. It says that no political committee shall receive contributions in excess of $3,000,000.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand all about the Corrupt Practices Act; and I think I have successfully lived within it, without any stretch of anybody's imagination. However, the problem raised by the able Senator from New Mexico goes beyond that. The Senator from New Mexico is contending—I take that back, because he is not making any contention as to the correct interpretation of the law—he is criticizing what he considers to be the purpose of the Fletcher statement.

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I pass the purpose, and I come back again to the problem. I think it is very important that somebody should say authentically—and I know of no one who could say it better than the able Senator from New Mexico—whether or not it is the purpose of the Hatch Act to say that $3,000,000 is the total expenditure which any political party may make in the Nation, in all 48 States. That is what Mr. Fletcher has finally said. Let me say that I have great respect for Mr. Fletcher. Nevertheless, regardless of his motive, the fact remains that we ought to be able to know definitely whether or not Mr. Fletcher's interpretation of the law is correct. I should appreciate a statement on the subject from the Senator from New Mexico. I will say to him that his statement would be substantially final so far as my opinion is concerned.

Mr. HATCH. Let me say, in reply to the Senator from Michigan, that I have doubted the wisdom of giving interpretations of the act. It has passed from the legislative branch of the Government and is now in the executive branch of the Government for enforcement. Regardless of the willingness of the Senator from Michigan to accept as final my word on the subject, the officials charged with the enforcement of the law might not accept my interpretation.

So I rather preferred to let those interpretations come from the proper sources. For that reason, I am not going into the problem which the Senator has raised, and I confess that a great many problems and many questions will crop up under this act as we have actual experience with it. But I am concerned more than anything else at this time with the matter to which I have referred. I was not referring to anyone's personal motive or anything of that kind, but the statement issued seemed to me to be absolutely designed to lay down a safe and sure plan to avoid the principle which was written into the law. There is no doubt in my mind what that principle is, namely, that in a national campaign a national party performing national functions should not expend more than $3,000,000. That would include the local committees and State committees engaged in furthering the national ticket. There is no doubt in my mind about the intent and purpose of the act, and there is no doubt in my mind about the intention of the Senator from Alabama in his amendment that contributions should be limited to $5,000, in the aggregate, to all committees, national and local. That was the intention; that was the purpose; and I wish that both parties, my own party as well as the Republican Party, could get together and adhere to that principle. There is too much money spent in campaigns, much of which is wasted. Three million dollars is ample for either party to spend in the national campaign.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I agree entirely with what the Senator is now saying, and I think I agree with his interpretation of the act, if I understand it. I think he is now saying that $3,000,000 applies to any expenditure, national or State, which has for its purpose the furtherance of a national ticket.

Mr. HATCH. That is undoubtedly the principle, and that is what I want to see carried out.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And that excludes from the $3,000,000 limitation State funds and local funds which are devoted legitimately to State and local questions?

Mr. HATCH. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

Mr. HATCH. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. If the conclusion upon which the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Michigan now appear to agree is not correct, is it not a fact that there is absolutely no limitation in the Hatch law that would restrict campaign contributions?

Mr. HATCH. Multiply by 48 the $3,000,000, and then multiply the county committees by $3,000,000 more, and there would be no limitation.

Mr. NEELY. If Mr. Fletcher's suggestion were carried out, would it not be possible to raise a political slush fund of a billion dollars for the use of any political party that might attempt to pollute a general election?

Mr. HATCH. That is quite correct.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. HATCH. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course we, as a Congress of the United States cannot limit the amount of money that can be used by a State committee or a county committee or a city committee.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator has worked on the legislation and has been up against that question before.

Mr. WHEELER. It is impossible to do it. We cannot stop somebody from contributing to the State or a local committee; we cannot stop the speakers that are sent out to speak for candidates for governor or Senator or Representative in Congress from speaking for the candidate for the President of the United States.

That is simply something that cannot be done without curbing free speech. In other words, if money is used in a county or a city or a State to hire a speaker for the State ticket, and he is told, "We want to speak for the Governor, for the State or county judge or anybody else on the Democratic ticket," he cannot be prevented from talking for the candidate for President. No law on the face of the earth could stop him, and if we attempted to do so we would be violating the provisions of the Constitution with reference to free speech. So, as a practical matter, and considering from the realistic standpoint, I never could conclude that if people wanted to get around the law there was any way in the world to reach them excepting to say, "You shall not turn in more than so much money to the national committee;" but they certainly can turn it into the local committees without any violation of law so long as they turn it in with the understanding that it is going to be used for the State and county tickets.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I had not intended to take so long, but the Senator from Montana did me the honor of listening to me. He has heard the statement which was issued, as I read it. I appreciate all the practical things he has mentioned. I have given much study and thought to the whole subject. I have a different idea of the limitation as a means of reaching the evil. But this is the law now, and the principle of the law is well understood. I ask the Senator if he ever read a more brazen statement than that issued by Mr. Fletcher?

Mr. WHEELER. I am frank to say that I did not see Mr. Fletcher's statement; I did not happen to read his statement this morning.

Mr. HATCH. It seems to me, as I said before, that it was designed to assure an absolutely safe method of evading the law which was enacted by the Congress.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, if that is the purpose, as I say, it will be evaded without question of doubt; but it seems to me, if what the Senator says about Mr. Fletcher's statement is true, that it is a flagrant violation of the intent of the law; and neither the Democratic Party nor the Republican Party ought to start out in the campaign with the idea that they are going to try to get around the law. I make that statement applicable to both the Democratic Party and the Republican Party.

Mr. HATCH. I made the same statement, and I hope my party will not do anything that could be subject to criticism. I will treat both parties equally.

Mr. WHEELER. The Congress of the United States has made its declaration of policy, and both parties, in good faith, ought to try to live up to the letter of the law and the spirit of the law as well. Of course, if money is donated to a national committee, it is sometimes sent to some of the States. That has not been done in my State; there at least it has been the other way around. But I think the limitation of $3,000,000 is wise and also that the limitation of $5,000 is a good thing; and, in my opinion, both parties ought to start out with the idea that they are going to live up not only to the letter but the spirit of the law.

Mr. HATCH. If both parties would issue a statement that they would comply with the principle of the law—and it is very easily to be obtained from a reading of the act—and then adhere to that principle, I think there could be nothing more wholesome and finer for the Government of this country than such an attitude on the part of both of the parties. I was keenly and gravely disappointed when I read this opinion of Mr. Fletcher in the New York Times.

Mr. WILEY subsequently said: Mr. President, I know that what I am about to say will be glad tidings of great joy to the distinguished senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH]. Earlier today he discussed the Hatch bill and the implications thereof in relation to an opinion given by Mr. Fletcher. I have in my hand a newspaper article found in the Washington Daily News, which I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be printed as requested.

The article appears at the conclusion of Mr. WILEY's remarks as exhibit 1.

Mr. WILEY. I asked that the remarks I am about to make now be placed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the debate had earlier today in connection with the remarks of the senior Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILEY. I wish to read from this article. It is headed:

Willkie Spikes Move to Thwart Hatch Act.

It seems, from this article, something having been said or suggested, that Mr. Willkie has immediately taken a position, and now that the leader of the Republican Party has taken this position, I ask that we get a similar promise from the head of the Democratic Party.

Let me read from the article:

Aside from any legal aspects, the nominee said, it is his firm intention that combined total expenses of the Republican National Committee, the Willkie-for-President clubs, and the independent Democratic movement shall be well within the sum mentioned in the Hatch Act, "of which I am heartily in favor."

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President. does the Senator from Wisconsin ask me to comment on that statement? He calls it to my attention.

Mr. WILEY. I am always glad to hear the distinguished Senator from New Mexico comment on any subject.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wish to say that I am very glad to have that statement from Mr. Willkie. I hope it is adhered to and lived up to.

I cast no aspersions against the Presidential nominee on the Republican ticket. But I know something about political committees and others who work on the side and go out and advise how things can be done, but "Let no one know about it." That was what I was condemning earlier today. I suggest if it is the desire to live up to the spirit of the Hatch law, let the plan which had been formerly made out, according to Mr. Fletcher's statement, and printed in the newspapers of yesterday, that all contributions go through the national committee—that was the previous plan before the passage of this law—let that plan be continued as it was originally, and there will be no question about the $3,000,000 limitation.

I suggest that as a method to avoid any confusion or doubt whatever.

Mr. WILEY. What I had to say was simply to clear up a little fog that had been spread earlier today, not so much by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico as by others, which was more or less a political miasma, we might say, and now that we have the challenge that comes to the country from the head of the Republican Party, saying that, so far as he is concerned, he is going to live up to the spirit and the letter of the law, we are entitled to a similar promise from the head of the Democratic Party.

In answer to the distinguished Senator's suggestion that the plan originally mentioned by Mr. Fletcher be carried out, I wish to say that there is something there that needs a little explaining. The plan originally, as I understand, that existed throughout the years in the Republican Party, was simply that the national committee was a clearinghouse for all funds that were used, not simply for national activities, but for State activities. One can appreciate that that plan could not be followed, because the national committee then would be charged with the funds that were used for State activities.

In this connection let me ask that there be inserted in the RECORD at this point sections 13 and 21 of the Political Activities and Federal Corrupt Practices Act, otherwise known as the Hatch Act.

There being no objection, the sections referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 13. (a) It is hereby declared to be a pernicious political activity, and it shall hereafter be unlawful, for any person, directly or indirectly, to make contributions in an aggregate amount in excess of $5,000, during any calendar year, or in connection with any campaign for nomination or election for an elective Federal office (including the offices of President of the United States, and Presidential and Vice Presidential electors), or to or on behalf of any committee or other organization engaged in furthering, advancing, or advocating the nomination or election of any candidate for any such office or the success of any national political party.

This subsection shall not apply to contributions made to or by a State or local committee or other State or local organization.

(b) For the purposes of this section—

(1) The term "person" includes an individual, partnership, committee, association, corporation, and any other organization or group of persons.

(2) The term "contribution" includes a gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit of money, or anything of value, and includes a contract, promise, or agreement, whether or not legally enforceable, to make a contribution.

(c) It is further declared to be a pernicious political activity, and it shall hereafter be unlawful for any person, individual, partnership, committee, association, corporation, and any other organization or group of persons to purchase or buy any goods, commodities, advertising, or articles of any kind or description where the proceeds of such a purchase, or any portion thereof, shall directly or indirectly inure to the benefit of or for any candidate for an elective Federal office (including the offices of President of the United States, and Presidential and Vice Presidential electors) or any political committee or other political organization engaged in furthering, advancing, or advocating the nomination or election of any candidate for any such office or the success of any national political party: Provided, That nothing in this sentence shall be construed to interfere with the usual and known business, trade, or profession of any candidate.

(d) Any person who engages in a pernicious political activity in violation of any provision of this section, shall upon conviction thereof be fined nor more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years. In all cases of violations of this section by a partnership, committee, association, corporation, or other organization or group of persons, the officers, directors, or managing heads thereof who knowingly and willfully participate in such violation, shall be subject to punishment as herein provided.

(e) Nothing in this section shall be construed to permit the making of any contribution which is prohibited by any provision of law in force on the date this section takes effect. Nothing in this act shall be construed to alter or amend any provisions of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, or any amendments thereto.

SEC. 21. No political committee shall receive contributions aggregating more than $3,000,000, or make expenditures aggregating more than $3,000,000, during any calendar year. For the purposes of this section, any contributions received and any expenditures made on behalf of any political committee with the knowledge and consent of the chairman or treasurer of such committee shall be deemed to be received or made by such committee. Any violation of this section by any political committee shall be deemed also to be a violation of this section by the chairman and the treasurer of such committee and by any other person responsible for such violation. Terms used in this section shall have the meaning assigned to them in section 302 of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, 1925, and the penalties provided in such act shall apply to violations of this section.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I have had some practical experience in politics in State campaigns and in national campaigns, and I know something of the way they are conducted and how they are financed. I do not believe the statement can be substantiated that the national committees of either party have ever financed State tickets in purely State campaigns. The national committees confine their activities to the election of national tickets.

I think we have a perfect and easy way to provide for a complete adherence and compliance with this law, by following the simple suggestion I made, that all contributions be made to the national committee, and let there be none of this "do not let anyone know" stuff. Those are the things I take offense at. Let the contributions be made openly, and honestly kept within the $3,000,000 limitation, and there will be no criticism and no dispute whatsoever.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. I do not want to reflect on my old-time friend and schoolmate, Wendell Willkie. Of course, I know that Mr. Willkie has given out a statement that he will obey the Hatch Act. Everything is "hunkydory" with Willkie. He is not going to take any money except up to a certain limit, and that is all within the law. That is Mr. Willkie; that is Mr. Puritan in politics. But then comes Mr. Fletcher, who shows how to get around the law Willkie is endorsing. That is Mr. Practical in politics. So what that looks like to me is a Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde act.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, there is no occasion for any Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde act in this situation. It is perfectly simple. Let both parties adhere to both the spirit and the letter of the law. Three million dollars is ample for them to spend. They will not be curtailed or hurt in any legitimate activity.

WILLKIE SPIKES MOVE TO THWART HATCH ACT

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

COLORADO SPRINGS, August 5.—Brushing aside a legalistic opinion by Henry P. Fletcher, counsel for the Republican National Committee, Wendell Willkie has made it plain that he expects obedience to his mandate that less than the Hatch Act limit of $3,000,000 shall be spent on his Presidential campaign.

When Mr. Fletcher arrived here, with the opinion in his brief case, some party leaders leaped merrily to the conclusion that ways had been found of getting around the Hatch Act, or through it, and spending several times $3,000,000.

But Mr. Willkie, when asked about it, said bluntly that he had not even read the Fletcher opinion—and the tone of his voice indicated he would not bother to read it.

Aside from any legal aspects, the nominee said, it is his firm intention that combined total expenses of the Republican National Committee, the Willkie-for-President clubs, and the Independent Democratic movement shall be well within the sum mentioned in the Hatch Act, "of which I am heartily in favor."

When some newspaper correspondents raised their eyebrows, Mr. Willkie went on to say that he hoped to keep the total around $2,500,000, but thought he shouldn't be taken to task if it ran, say, to $2,750,000.

"And what if it reaches $5,000,000?" asked one reporter.

"You can come back," retorted the candidate, "and call me a liar."

MR. FLETCHER'S IDEA

Mr. Fletcher, having studied the Hatch Act with "several prominent lawyers," concluded that its language would permit the National Committee to spend $3,000,000 and each of the other national groups to spend an equal amount, if they could get it.

He opined further that individuals who contribute $5,000 to the national campaign—that, also, being a Hatch Act limit—may safely give as much more as they wish to State or local committees. And he recommended an arrangement entirely divorcing the State and local committees from the Republican National Committee, so that there might be no question of their legal right to collect all the money anyone is willing to give.

HEADQUARTERS PORTRAIT

Typical of scenes constantly being enacted in the Willkie sunparlor headquarters atop the hotel where he is staying, and typical also, one suspects, of the coming campaign, was the little weekend drama when the candidate conferred with a group of Republican leaders.

He sat in his accustomed place on the broad divan. Beside him sat diminutive JOE MARTIN, chairman of the National Committee, his legs hardly reaching the floor. Joe was explaining some phases of the campaign organization to reporters.

"Excuse me, Joe, but——"

It was Mr. Willkie interrupting. It happened not once, but several times, during the series of newspaper conferences in explanation of the party leaders' deliberations. The candidate moved in to express his own views, to supplement this or that statement—in short, to take command.

HE TAKES THE REINS

"Excuse me, Joe——"

That is typical of the candidate's assumption of command—politely, but firmly. It may not always be "Joe." It may be "John" or "Henry" or "Sam" or "Bill." But it will be always the slightly husky voice of Wendell Willkie.

Republican leaders have discovered that—and they will have to like it. Undoubtedly they will, for their candidate has a buoyant confidence that is infectious and in a Gallup poll yesterday they saw a Republican Presidential candidate on the credit side of the electoral ledger for the first time in too long a while.

The candidate also made it plain that he will supervise the whole campaign and all its committees. For he said that coordination between the various groups—the National Committee, the Willkie-for-President clubs, and the Democrats-for-Willkie organization—would be "through personal representation of mine."

In 1936 Republicans spent something over $5,000,000.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. In order that the Senate may be advised of the probable course of legislation during the week, I wish to state, after conferring with the Senator from Texas, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that it has been agreed that the military training bill, which was reported this morning from the Military Affairs Committee, will be taken up on Thursday of this week for consideration.

The Senator from Texas reported the bill today, but he would not be able to make a full statement concerning it until tomorrow, and it has been thought wise to give the Members of the Senate until Thursday to study the bill and the report before taking it up.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator described fully the bill? Does he mean the compulsory military training bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. The military training bill; yes, that is the one I have in mind.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator anticipate that prior to that time we will have disposed of the National Guard bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes; that is, of course, understood.

Mr. NORRIS. And, of course, if that should not happen, I suppose the consideration of the other bill would be postponed?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; it is not the purpose to interfere with the consideration of the pending bill if it has not been disposed of, and I have assumed——

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is a fair assumption.

Mr. BARKLEY. That it would be disposed of.

Mr. NORRIS. But the contrary might happen and such things have happened sometimes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, if the pending bill is still under consideration, it will not be displaced to take up the other bill.

I may also state, assuming that the pending bill be disposed of, as many Members think it will be today or at least tomorrow, it is contemplated that in the meantime before Thursday we will take up for consideration a bill reported from the Agricultural Committee by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] amending the Agricultural Adjustment Act in certain provisions with respect to the marketing of agricultural products. If there is time, the bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], known as the investment trust bill, will also be taken up for consideration. That is on the theory that there will be time for the consideration of those two bills following the disposition of the National Guard bill.

THE GUFFEYS OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, the Republican nominee for President, born and baptized Lewis Wendel Wilkus, now commonly known as Wendell Willkie, has, on several occasions recently, referred slightingly to "the Guffeys of Pennsylvania."

For his information, I would like to say that my Guffey forebears sailed from Londonderry, Ireland, in the spring of 1738 and arrived in Philadelphia the same year. In 1758 my immediate forebears followed Colonel Forbes in his expedition over the Alleghany Mountains to western Pennsylvania, where they have resided ever since.

On my maternal side, the Houghs came to Pennsylvania with William Penn. Two of my forebears, father and son, fought in the Revolutionary War. After President Washington retired they became loyal and devoted followers of Thomas Jefferson, and later they became militant Democrats under the leadership of Andrew Jackson.

In the more than 200 years they have resided in Pennsylvania they have never found it necessary, expedient, or advisable to change their name, to change their religion, to change their politics—or to desert the country of their adoption.

ACTIVE SERVICE OF NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVE AND RETIRED PERSONNEL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Donahey	King	Reed
Andrews	Downey	La Follette	Reynolds
Ashurst	Frazier	Lee	Russell
Austin	George	Lodge	Schwartz
Bankhead	Gerry	Lucas	Schwellenbach
Barbour	Gibson	Lundeen	Sheppard

Clark, Idaho	Holt	Overton	Wheeler
Connally	Hughes	Pepper	White
Danaher	Johnson, Calif.	Pittman	Wiley
Davis	Johnson, Colo.	Radcliffe

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, before the creation of the Federal Constitution the States had troops of their own, known as militia, established and regulated by their own laws.

Under the Federal Constitution, State laws continue to operate in connection with State militia as well as certain Federal laws.

Today, in practical effect, those composing the militia of the States have been made by Federal law members also of what this Federal law describes as the militia of the United States, the result being one physical group in each State with two legal designations. The part of such militia which is organized into troops is designated by the Federal law as the National Guard, and the part not so organized it designates as the unorganized militia.

The National Guard has a dual function.

As a part of the State Militia, and together with it, the National Guard may be called by act of Congress into active military service to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

As a part of the Army of the United States, made so by the National Defense Act of 1916, as amended, it may be ordered into the general military service without regard to the limitations heretofore specified with said Army by the President when Congress declares an emergency or declares war.

In language leaving no doubt that in his view a national emergency confronts us, the President on July 29, 1940, requested Congress to enact legislation enabling him to order the National Guard of the United States to active service for such period of intensive training as may be necessary to raise its efficiency to a point comparable with that of the Regular Army. The President transmitted with this request a draft of the legislation he deemed imperative, and that draft composes the joint resolution before us.

Under this joint resolution the President is given authority to order into the active military service of the United States, for a period of 12 consecutive months, any or all members and units of any or all reserve components of the Army of the United States, and retired personnel of the Regular Army with or without their consent, to such extent and in such manner as the President may deem necessary in strengthening the national defense.

Let me say here that the reserve components of the Army of the United States consist of the National Guard of the United States, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the organized Reserve, the Regular Army Reserve, and the Enlisted Reserve Corps. The President proposes, if this joint resolution is enacted, to order the Guard to duty in successive increments to permit the effective use of training facilities and equipment immediately available, and that each increment shall be released when it attains the desired state of efficiency or shall have served 12 consecutive months.

The joint resolution further provides that the members and the units of the reserve components ordered into active Federal service shall not be employed beyond the limits of the Western Hemisphere except in the Territories and possessions of the United States, including the Philippine Islands.

The other reserve components, aside from the National Guard, affected by the joint resolution are the Officers' Reserve Corps, numbering at present approximately 116,000 officers, the retired personnel of the Regular Army, amounting to 3,750 officers and 12,000 enlisted men, the Regular Army Reserve, totaling 35,000, and the Enlisted Reserve Corps, including probably 3,000 men.

It will be seen that under the provisions of this joint resolution the President is authorized to order into service the units and personnel involved with or without their consent. It is necessary to impose a requirement of this kind in order promptly to obtain the needed forces and assistance. Without such a requirement the response will be slow and ineffective. General Marshall said at the hearings on the pending measure that the situation at the present time as to our availability of personnel in the Regular Army for training, our availability of material or equipment in the Regular Army for training, and as to the necessities for having certain trained units in the Regular Army available for immediate action, should necessity arise, is such that a mobilization of the National Guard is necessary to the functioning of the selective-service act, as well as in the matter of the Guard's own training.

Provision is made in the joint resolution making sure that all the personnel ordered into active service shall receive, while in such service, the pay and allowances and the other benefits prescribed for the Regular Army.

While section 3 of the measure before us was not proposed by the President, it was the sense of the Senate Military Affairs Committee that an effort should be made to restore persons ordered into service to their former employment at the end of their training or to employment of similar pay and status.

When such persons have been employed by the United States Government, its territories or possessions, or the District of Columbia, they shall be restored to such positions, or to positions of like status and pay.

When such persons were employed by private employers dealing in interstate commerce, such employers shall restore such persons to the positions they held, or to positions of like status and pay, unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so.

When such persons were in the employ of any State or political subdivision thereof, it is declared to be the sense of Congress that they should be restored to such positions or positions of like status and pay.

Persons restored to Federal Government positions or to positions in private employment shall be so restored without loss of seniority, insurance participation, or other benefits, and such persons shall not be discharged from such positions without cause within 1 year after such restoration.

The failure or refusal of any private employer to comply with the provisions of the joint resolution shall be an unfair labor practice within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act. If no remedy is available under the National Labor Relations Act, the district court of the United States for any district in which such employer maintains a place of business shall have power, upon the filing of a motion, petition, or other appropriate pleading by the person entitled to the benefits of the joint resolution, to specifically require such employer to comply with the spirit and purpose of the joint resolution. The court shall order a speedy hearing in any such case, and shall advance it on the calendar.

Having submitted this analysis of the measure under consideration, I desire to advance certain observations in reference to the National Guard.

The National Guard, to the extent permitted by time and circumstance, has made remarkable advances in military science and tactics; but these advances have not afforded it sufficient opportunity to meet the demands of present-day warfare. Its wonderful record justifies the best possible training and preparation.

Today, the National Guard has the requisite organization and to a substantial degree the requisite equipment. Its officers have had thorough basic training, and some work of a more advanced type. They should now have a long period of physical hardening and intensive training in the fast-moving methods of modern warfare.

As a result of our traditional military policy we have today an efficient but by present-day standards a small Regular Army, backed by an equally small National Guard army.

General Marshall, our great Chief of Staff, and many other military experts are convinced that we should have a strong "army in being," thoroughly seasoned and trained. There is but one way to obtain that result efficiently and in any reasonable length of time. That way is by utilizing the National Guard in the role which for 20 years has been planned for it under the National Defense Act, namely, a vital component of our existing Regular Army.

For 20 years the National Guard has been maintained largely at Federal expense for just such a situation as we now look upon.

In his message of July 29, 1940, requesting this measure, the President said that the increasing seriousness of the international situation demands that every element in our defense structure be brought as rapidly as possible to the highest state of efficiency in training as well as in equipment and material. He paid high tribute to the citizen soldier, out of whose patriotism and devotion the National Guard has evolved.

The President said that some weeks before he had asked Congress for authority to order the National Guard into active service should an emergency require this action when Congress was not in session. He added that this proposal was no longer sufficient; that he was convinced that the security of the Nation demands that the National Guard and other reserve components of the Army of the United States be brought to the highest possible state of training efficiency more rapidly than their present program permits.

The President stated that he realized the personal sacrifice a period of active duty demanded from the reserve components, and that for this reason he had deferred until the last moment the request for immediate action. He stated that he could not with clear conscience postpone longer this vitally essential step in our progress toward adequate preparedness.

The President gave due and merited praise to the Officers' Reserve Corps, that magnificent body of men in private life who, at great cost of time and toil, have fitted themselves for the work of an Army officer in order to aid in their country's defense. He asserted that this splendid body of officers has had little opportunity for service with troops, and that to the maximum extent possible their training should now be perfected by an adequate period of active service; that if ordered to active duty they can acquire the desired efficiency and at the same time supply the increased need for officers in our expanded Regular Army.

General George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff of the Army, came before the Senate Military Affairs Committee at its invitation to testify in reference to the pending measure.

He said it was the feeling of the War Department that it was urgently necessary that at least a portion of the National Guard be ordered to active duty, recruited up to full strength, and seasoned and trained as rapidly as possible; that this should be proceeded with as quickly as possible; that the Army was deficient in organized units trained in a sufficient strength for the necessary defensive measures the country might have to take; and that from the viewpoint of the War Department it was very urgent that it be permitted to proceed about the business of developing and training the military forces for the defense of this country in the present emergency in an orderly and businesslike fashion.

General Marshall stated that as matters now stand the War Department is unable, except through a very limited use of WPA funds, to make any preparation for the shelter of the units that might be called out for training under this measure, and that the longer we wait the more difficult the situation will become; because from the viewpoint of construction the winter is upon us; that it takes 3 or 4 months adequately to prepare for the shelter of men, to protect their health, to facilitate their training after the money is made available; that the Department is very much embarrassed because the time is passing; that Congress has before it a measure for the training of men from civil life on an unpredecented scale; and that the ordering of the National Guard on active duty preliminary to such training is an absolute necessity.

General Marshall warned that our situation is utterly different from that of 1917. He said that at that time no one felt any peril in the United States; that we could proceed with deliberation; that we could wait until we built cantonments; that we could wait until we trained officers; that we could wait until we gathered shipping; that we could wait until we sent troops to Europe, and train them after we got them to Europe. Then he added that today, in his judgment, the security and the safety of this country depend on having available at the earliest practicable moment trained, seasoned men in adequate numbers; that there is no conceivable way to obtain them except by some such measure as this, followed by some form of selective training; that this is but a base of departure to the development of an adequate force to maintain the security of this country in the Caribbean region and the northern hemisphere, at least; that we cannot afford to speculate with the security of this country.

It is the unanimous conviction of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs that these warnings of the President and General Marshall should be immediately heeded.

So we report this measure favorably to the consideration of the Senate.

After numerous interruptions and colloquies during the course of his speech, Mr. SHEPPARD said:

Mr. President, I ask that the colloquies and interruptions which occurred in the course of my speech be printed at the conclusion of my remarks in order that my speech may appear as an undisturbed and undissected whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The colloquies occurring during the delivery of Mr. SHEPPARD'S speech are as follows:

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I am rather curious as to why the drafting officer preparing the joint resolution saw fit to use the words "reserve components of the Army" instead of saying "National Guard." Most of us are not familiar with the language employed in describing military units. Why should the joint resolution say "reserve components of the Army" instead of just saying "National Guard"? If I read the joint resolution merely as an average layman, I would not know that it meant calling out the National Guard at all. I wonder if there was any purpose in employing that sort of language.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The National Guard is one of the reserve components of the Army. The joint resolution calls out the other reserve components as well as the National Guard.

Mr. BONE. I understand that; but I wondered why the term "National Guard" was not employed here, so that the language would be a little more revealing. I am curious about that, because the average layman reading the joint resolution would never know that the National Guard was to be called out unless he could infer that from some of the subsequent language.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am sure there was no intention on the part of the drafting officer to conceal that fact in any way.

Mr. BONE. I understand that; but why do we so frequently use such stilted language in drawing bills? Why are we not forthright? Why do we not call a spade a spade, so that persons who are familiar with ordinary English can understand why certain things are sought to be done?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall endeavor to describe what those reserve components are in the course of my remarks.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Can the Senator tell me how many men can be called out under the joint resolution?

Mr. SHEPPARD. About 225,000 in the National Guard alone. It is the plan of the War Department to call them out by increments, and the first increment is to be about 55,000. The names of the units to be called out are given in the report on the resolution.

Mr. WHEELER. Is the so-called State militia included?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That part of the State militia which is formed into the National Guard, not the other part.

Mr. WHEELER. Not the other part?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No.

Mr. WHEELER. Under the Constitution there is no right in the Congress of the United States to call out the State militia unless there is an insurrection or an invasion. Has there been a change in the provisions of the Constitution?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No. I have just referred to that distinction. The State militia may be called by act of Congress into the military service for the purposes the Senator has mentioned, but as a part of the Army of the United States, made so by the National Defense Act of 1916, that part of the militia known as the National Guard may be ordered into the general military service without regard to those limitations.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator does not mind my interrupting him, let me say that the adjutant general of one of the States asked me why it was that the National Guard had not been built up throughout the United States. I happen to know that in my own particular State of Montana those charged with the duty have been trying to get money to build up the National Guard, but they were unable to build it up because they could not get the money from the War Department with which to do it. Does the Senator know anything about that?

Mr. SHEPPARD. If Congress did not give the War Department sufficient money to take care of the National Guard in Montana, the War Department, of course, could not furnish them the money. On the other hand, the militia in Montana must meet certain requirements before they can get the funds. I do not know what the situation was in that State.

Mr. WHEELER. They met all the requirements, and there were requests for building up units of the National Guard in several of the cities, but they were unable to get the money. Information came to my attention to the effect that the Bureau of the Budget had turned down larger appropriations by the Congress for building up the National Guard, and I thought that perhaps the Senator, as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, could give me some light upon that particular phase.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The chances are that the War Department has not been given sufficient funds to reach the State of Montana at this time. I do not know what causes animated the Bureau of the Budget in shutting off funds, if it did so.

Mr. WHEELER. I thought probably the Senator, as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, would know whether or not the Bureau of the Budget had turned down requests by the Army or by his committee for larger appropriations.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have not looked into that particular phase of the matter. My committee is an authorization committee. The Committee on Appropriations deals with appropriations.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I understood the Senator to state that it is the intention to call immediately 55,000 of the National Guard. Can the Senator state how soon the remainder of the guard will be called?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Department will call them in increments, and as soon as facilities are available they will call out the next. I imagine it will be several months. The particular measure before us calls for the first increment to be in training for 12 months.

Mr. TAFT. How soon would the second increment be called in all probability?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Just as soon as facilities are available.

Mr. TAFT. If there is such an immediate need as to require a draft, why not call the whole 240,000 today?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Because adequate facilities are not available.

Mr. TAFT. The joint resolution, of course, authorizes the calling of the whole 240,000, but I wondered why, if there is such an emergency as to require the immediate conscription of 400,000 men by the first of October, the entire 240,000 of the National Guard are not called immediately, instead of only 55,000, and then, as I understand, postponing the calling of the rest until a year from now, after the first 55,000 have been trained.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Under the training system, it is expected to have 400,000 trainees in the service by October.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. DOWNEY. Let me inquire whether I understand correctly that the Army intends to call out additional units of the National Guard as rapidly as provision can be made for their living and training.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is what I replied to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. DOWNEY. I understood the Senator to say that they would not be called out for a year.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I meant that the various increments would serve a year each.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if such an emergency exists at the present time that we have to resort to conscription, why not call out the whole 240,000 men now?

Mr. SHEPPARD. There are not sufficient facilities for the housing and training of such a number at the present time.

Mr. WHEELER. The Government cannot equip them, and, in addition to that, has not the housing facilities for them, have they?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not the housing facilities.

Mr. WHEELER. And the Government has not the clothes for them, unless they have their uniforms already as militiamen?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think perhaps the clothing is available.

Mr. WHEELER. The clothing has been furnished to them in the various States, but the Government has not the housing facilities for them, and has not the other equipment for them, and that is why the whole 240,000 are not going to be called?

Mr. SHEPPARD. One of the reasons is the lack of housing.

Mr. WHEELER. Do I understand the Senator to say they are going to call out 50,000 now, or soon, and later are going to return those to private life and call out 50,000 more?

Mr. SHEPPARD. They keep all increments 12 months each, and as each increment completes its 12 months it goes back to the State from whence it came. The law will operate to June 30, 1942.

Mr. WHEELER. What I am trying to get at is, if there is the great emergency about which we hear so much, and our national security is in danger, why not call out the whole 240,000 men now, and why is it necessary, if we call out 240,000 men now, to conscript the youth of the country, because of this great national emergency, or, as it was stated in the original measure, because the integrity of the United States and our democracy are in danger? To me it does not make sense. Perhaps it does to some of the propagandists who are writing columns for the press, but to me, and I think to the great majority of the American people, it does not make sense. The American people should be taken into the confidence of the officials, and told what they are going to do, and what the great emergency is.

It is all very well for Senators to rise and say there is a great emergency, but that does not mean anything. What the people would know is, what constitutes the emergency, what is the background of the great emergency? Are we about to be attacked by Japan, are we about to be attacked by Mexico, are we about to be attacked by some other nation? We have heard nothing but "emergency, emergency, emergency," until it has gotten so that it does not mean much to the American people. We should know what are the facts, and not simply have the conclusion that there is an emergency.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the Senator cannot see an emergency in the present world situation, I am certain I could not persuade him that there is one.

Mr. WHEELER. I can see an emergency, but the only emergency I see is that an election is coming on. [Laughter.] It seems to me that it is not sufficient for the Senator to rise and say that if I cannot see that an emergency exists in world affairs, he cannot persuade me. Of course I can see an emergency for some countries, but at the present time I do not see any emergency, and I am sure that the great majority of the American people do not see any great emergency, so far as the peace and security of the United States of America are concerned, except what is given out by the propagandists to scare the Members of Congress into thinking that something is going to happen immediately if we do not grant to the executive branch all the dictatorial powers they want granted.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the Senator cannot see an emergency in the relation of the present world situation to the United States, I feel sure I would be unable to convince him.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator tell me what the emergency is?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is the well-known determination of the dictators of a large part of the world to destroy democracy throughout the world.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator think that the German Government is coming here to attack and take over the United States?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I believe that Government will try to do so.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator really believes that Mr. Hitler is coming here to attack the United States?

Mr. SHEPPARD. He will try to attack the United States. That is my firm belief, or I would not be here advocating this measure, and if I cannot convince the Senate that this is a proper measure, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am convinced that there must be an emergency from one experience I have had, among others, if the Senator who has the floor will bear with me for a moment. I recently persuaded the Senate to pass Senate bill 1108, which we call in our country the Peeler law, which went to the House and was there referred to the Ways and Means Committee of the House. The chairman of the subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee of the House called me up and said the bill had been set aside at the behest of the State Department, because our relationships with Japan were of such a delicate nature that the State Department did not want this purely domestic bill to be passed by the Congress. In other words, according to the State Department, our relationships with Japan are so delicate that we do not dare to say what we will do with logs grown in the American forests. Either the State Department is all wrong or the Chief of Staff of the Army is all wrong, but there is an emergency.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask the Senator for an interpretation at that point. He is referring to the language of the bill which authorizes the President to order the militia into active service "for a period of 12 consecutive months." Does that mean that they have to be ordered for 12 months; that they could not be ordered for 10 months or 8 months?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is my construction that they must serve 12 consecutive months.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the emergency were for a period of less than 12 months, would the President still have to call the militia for 12 months?

Mr. SHEPPARD. He would.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the language that has been stricken out, which provided "not to exceed 1 year," the President could have ordered the militia out for any number of months.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. But I assume that the change made by the committee presupposes that it is to be for a definite 12 months' period, no more and no less.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is what we mean. We have changed the language to mean 12 consecutive months.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. KING. Assume that A, B, and C are members of the National Guard now, and anticipating that they may be called, that an emergency does exist, and that their conditions are such financially and in respect to health as to make it almost imperative that they shall not serve, may they resign without being subject to court martial?

Mr. SHEPPARD. They may be discharged from their enlistment.

Mr. KING. Obviously, however, if they are inducted into the service then they may not resign.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think arrangements are being made so that they can be honorably discharged if the individual cases justify it.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Unless the ancient rules and regulations of the Army and the National Guard have been greatly modified, an enlisted man cannot resign. But he can, in favorable circumstances, obtain a discharge, which amounts to the same thing.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. NEELY. If the force under consideration were called out for a 12-month period to meet a specific emergency, could it not be disbanded when the emergency had passed even if the 12-month period had not expired?

Mr. SHEPPARD. This measure provides that these men must stay in service 12 months.

Mr. NEELY. But not after the passing of the emergency which made it necessary to call them to the colors.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not so understand it.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. HILL. With reference to the words "12 consecutive months," it will be noted that the joint resolution as prepared by the War Department and introduced by the chairman of the committee, provided that the National Guard should be called out for a period "not to exceed 1 year." The words "not to exceed 1 year" have been stricken, and the committee amendment has been offered in lieu thereof, to wit: "12 consecutive months."

I think the Senate ought to know the reason why the committee amendment is offered. It is offered at the request of the National Guard itself, as represented by Gen. Milton A. Reckord, who is the chairman of the legislative committee of the National Guard Association, who came before the Senate Military Affairs Committee speaking for the National Guard and asked that the language be modified as it is provided in the committee amendment. General Reckord, speaking for the National Guard, took the position that the National Guard felt that they ought to have at least 12 months of training if the training was to be on a proper and efficient basis. Is that not true?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is quite true.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Agreeing with everything that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] has just stated, the chairman of the committee will recall that the Army officers themselves representing the War Department did not want the National Guard called out for a period to exceed a year, and the National Guard did not want to be called out for less than a year. They wanted to be called out for at least a year. So the committee, in order to compromise these two viewpoints, decided upon the 12 consecutive months' period.

In reference to the question raised by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] a moment ago about men resigning before this measure is passed, before the call is made, before the National Guard is ordered into service, let me say that the National Guard officers and men are permitted to resign through their State officials, that is, the Governors of the States may accept their resignations.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. The joint resolution provides that the President is authorized—

> To order into the active military service of the United States for a period of 12 consecutive months, any or all members and units of any or all reserve components of the Army.

And so forth. If the President exercises that authority, and orders into service a portion of the units, will he have exhausted the authority under this joint resolution, or can he from time to time order out additional units, and require each of the units he orders out to serve for a period of 12 consecutive months, so that certain units may be serving, we will say, from October 1, 1940, to October 1, 1941, and other units may serve from January 1, 1941, to January 1, 1942? Or is it the fact that when the President exercises this authority and issues an order, he exhausts his authority under the joint resolution, so that when he issues an order, he must determine what portion of the reserve shall be ordered into active service and shall serve for 12 consecutive months?

Mr. SHEPPARD. He can from time to time order out additional units.

Mr. OVERTON. I do not think the Senator grasped my meaning, or, rather, understands what I am asking. If the President exercises his authority, and, we will say, orders out one-half of the Reserves, can he later on order out additional Reserves?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; until June 30, 1942, he can.

Mr. OVERTON. Any part of the Reserves?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The language of the joint resolution provides that he may order out "any or all members and units of any or all Reserve components of the Army of the United States." He does not have to order them all out at once, but during the entire period, until June 30, 1942, he is authorized to order out any or all of them, and he may order out part of them at any time, and part of them later.

Mr. OVERTON. Each part that is ordered out will have to serve 12 consecutive months?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The President proposes, if this joint resolution is enacted, to order the Guard to duty in successive increments to permit the effective use of training facilities and equipment immediately available.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Can the Senator tell whether housing is available for the 242,000 total of the National Guard?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is not at present available. The Army is going to provide as much housing as it can for as large a number as can be trained within the time the joint resolution is in operation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Government cannot house 242,000 National Guardsmen for several months, how can it house 400,000 conscripts?

Mr. SHEPPARD. For the present we are going to send the trainees into the existing housing that the Army now has and assign them to units in the Army which are below strength.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Before the Senator was interrupted he was detailing the various other branches of the Reserve service which are covered by the joint resolution. Will he give us the numbers which are involved at each point in his recital?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The President would call out only as many as could reasonably be taken care of.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What is the total?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think I can recall the figures offhand. The National Guard at present is about 225,000; the Officers' Reserve Corps, 116,000; the enlisted Reserve Corps, about 3,000; the Regular Army Reserve, probably 35,000; retired officers, about 3,700. The enlisted Reserve Corps consists principally of enlisted specialists.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That represents a total of 166,000 Reserves in addition to the National Guard, does it not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is approximately correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So, the joint resolution finally covers 166,000 plus 242,000, which is in excess of 400,000.

Mr. SHEPPARD. As an outside limit.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the difference between the Officers Reserve Corps and the Organized Reserves referred to?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Officers' Reserve Corps is a group of Reserve officers, while the Organized Reserves comprise these Reserve officers and enlisted men assigned to them.

Mr. BARKLEY. For instance, take the case of a young man who has graduated from the Air Corps Training School, and has served a year. Let us say he has graduated at Kelly Field, and has served a year, has been put on the Reserve list, and is now a Reserve officer. There is an organization of Reserve officers to which such officers may or may not belong. Would such an officer be included in either the Organized Reserves or the Reserve Corps?

Mr. SHEPPARD. He is included in the Officers' Reserve Corps, but it might not be called under this measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. Why not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Because there are so many in the Reserve who have not had any training at all.

Mr. BARKLEY. It seems to me it would be to the Government's advantage to take the men who have received intensive training and who have served a year after finishing their training, and have been put in what is called the Reserve Corps. It seems to me the Government would sustain a great loss if such men were not subject to call for duty.

Mr. SHEPPARD. They are subject to call, but they have already had training.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Under the present arrangement, the 110,000 Reserve officers have had only 14 days' training every 3 or 4 years. So many of them have had such little training at all that I imagine they would be taken first, although if there were some special reason for calling such an officer as the Senator mentioned he would probably be called.

Mr. BARKLEY. It seems to me that it would be a great loss to the Government not to be able to call back to service a young man upon whom the Government had spent considerable money in training him as a future officer, who had served 1 year after leaving school, and who had been put on the reserve list subject to call at any time. His year's training at the aviation school and his year's service in the Army mean 2 years of real training.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is quite true.

Mr. BARKLEY. The theory is that those who have had 2 years' training do not need it as much as those who have had only a few days' training out of each year.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I think the Senate ought to realize that building an army involves something more than the question of men. We build an organization, a machine. If the organization is to be efficient and able to function, we must have the proper balance within the organization as between types of men and the service they are rendering.

The question has been asked, Why call out the trainees under a selective-service bill when we can call out 250,000 men through the National Guard? Let me explain the reason. Today, many of the units within the National Guard have not their full quota of men. Today, an infantry company in the National Guard has only 60 men. The war strength of an infantry company is approximately 200 men. The infantry company of the National Guard is short 140 men. What we do is to call out the infantry company of the National Guard. Perhaps it has the full officer personnel, the 3 officers prescribed, both for war strength and for peace strength. We take the officers and the 60 men, and fill in with the trainees until we have the fully rounded-out war-time-strength company. So we must think of this thing not only in terms of numbers, but in terms of organization of units and of the whole machinery. Is not that correct?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Montana to ask a question of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. WHEELER. I am asking for information. I understand that the War Department is authorized to raise the Army to a certain point. What is that point?

Mr. HILL. Three hundred and seventy-five thousand. That is the Regular Army.

Mr. WHEELER. That is the Regular Army. The quotas for June and July have been filled, have they not?

Mr. HILL. That is correct, but——

Mr. WHEELER. Let me finish. As I understand from the War Department, the quotas for 3-year enlistments have been completely filled. The department also informed my office that, so far as August is concerned, no doubt the August quota will be filled. Cannot the men required to fill the quotas be obtained from 3-year enlistments at the present time?

Mr. HILL. Not if we are to have the Army which the War Department says we should have.

Let us understand clearly about this quota business. It is nothing more nor less than what The Adjutant General, as the chief recruiting officer of the Army, estimated we could obtain through the recruiting system. In June we obtained approximately 22,000 enlistments. That did not mean that we got 22,000 additional men in the Army. We made a net gain of only about 16,000 because of the 22,000, some 6,000 were reenlistments. In June we got 16,000 additional men. The War Department is saying to us that we should have, as quickly as possible, a Regular Army of a certain size, some 240,000 or 250,000 members of the National Guard and, in addition, some 400,000 trainees.

In the opinion of the War Department and in my opinion, we cannot bring in anything like 400,000 men by the volunteer system in the immediate future. We are getting 16,000 men a month, and we are trying to get 400,000. Twenty-five months would be required, and even then we should never get 400,000, because they would serve for only 12 months. Two hundred thousand would be out before we could get the others.

Mr. WHEELER. Nobody knows. It is only a guess, because we have not tried that system.

Coming back to the C. C. C. camps, we pay the C. C. C. boys $30 a month, and in many places they work about 4 hours a day. We propose to draft young men into the Army, pay them $21 a month, and put them in the Army Reserve, to be called out later if we find it necessary. The C. C. C. camps all over the United States have had many, many more applicants than they could handle. That was true in my State, in New York, and in every other State in the Union. The young men wanted the training in the C. C. C. camps for a year's time at $30 a month. If we can get them in the C. C. C. camps by paying them $30 a month, I have not the slightest doubt that we can get them in the Army. At least, it seems to me that that system ought to be tried before we violate every tradition and every principle upon which our Government was founded, and conscript the youth of the Nation when we are not facing a war.

Something has been said about an emergency. My attention has just been called to a statement by Maj. Gen. James K. Parsons. He is now in the Army. He was speaking before 231 businessmen at Fort Meade. General Parsons asserted that—

> America can be defended by an Army and Navy of moderate size. There are alarmists who think we are wide open to attack. We are not. They are merely the victims of nightmares and ignorance. Such people are dangerous. We need calm intelligence now as perhaps we have needed it never before.

That is what I have been repeatedly saying. We have many alarmists about the country who are trying to tell us that we are open to attack, that we are to be attacked, that we must have conscription, and that we must have an armed camp here. Here is a major general in the Army who cautions the people against alarmists. I presume he meant some of the "columnists."

While I am on my feet I should like to call attention to the propaganda which is going on, if I may interrupt the Senator a few moments longer.

Secretary Knox says:

> If we are to protect ourselves, our integrity, and this hemisphere, we can take but one action—adopt compulsory military training now.

Yet when his nomination was up for confirmation before the Senate committee, this is what he said:

> With such a Navy as I have described, we would never need more than a moderate sized Regular Army of 300,000 men, supplemented with a well-trained, well-equipped National Guard. This would give us a first line of defense on land of 600,000 men, all that we would require to supplement our naval forces. Such a Navy would require a personnel of not more than 200,000 men.

Now, all of a sudden, the minute he is confirmed, he joins in the cry that we must have conscription in order to preserve the integrity of the United States of America.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator overlooked the fact that we are to defend Patagonia, Tierra del Fuego, and Coral Islands in the Caribbean Sea.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know Major General Parsons to whom the Senator from Montana refers, but I wonder if he looks upon his superior officer, General Marshall, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, as an alarmist? General Marshall has recommended the pending measure and he has recommended the proposed legislation which has been reported today from the Committee on Military Affiairs. I am wondering whether this General Parsons, whom I do not know, in his diatribe against alarmists, includes his superior officer, the Chief of Staff of the United States Army?

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator, so that there may be no mistake about it, that, so far as this particular piece of legislation is concerned, I have no objection to it; but I am saying that, so far as the conscription bill is concerned, I do not believe it is necessary, and I approve entirely of the statement made by General Parsons with reference to alarmists. He is Maj. Gen. James K. Parsons, commanding officer of the Third Corps Area, and I assume that he is in good standing in the Army at this particular time.

Then, I call attention to what Colonel Knox said when he was before the committee, and I contrast that with the statements he is making now. I could also call attention to other statements made before the Naval Affairs Committee, and I intend to do so before the day is over, but I do not want to take the time of the Senator from Texas now. I intend, however, to call attention of the Senate to them, and also to what some other naval officers and military officers of the United States have said about this matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator from Texas will yield further there——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Simply because of the immediate context of this debate, let me say there is a vast difference, as the Senator realizes, between a regular standing Army of 300,000 or 375,000 men, which is to be the peacetime strength of the Regular Army, and a program of training men who might be called into service in the event of war or an emergency. There is nothing, it seems to me, inconsistent between the position taken by anybody who says if we have a Navy large enough to defend the United States against any aggression that we might not need a Regular Army of more than 300,000 men. But, of course, we are increasing the Navy because we realize that at the present juncture we do not have that sort of a Navy. If there should be an attack upon us from two oceans, we do not have a two-ocean Navy, and, because we do not have a two-ocean Navy, we are increasing it so that in 5 or 6 years from now we will have a two-ocean Navy.

What I understand the selective military service bill provides or contemplates is that from the entire body of the men of the United States within certain ages, subject to certain exemptions and exceptions, men shall be trained against the day when we may need more than 300,000 or 375,000 men or even 400,000 or 500,000 men in the Army. They will not constitute a part of the Regular Army; they will not form a part of our Regular Military Establishment; but they will be trained so that, in the event of war, in which we might be engaged they will be qualified to be called at once into the service of the United States to form not a part of the Regular Army for all time to come, but to form an army for that particular situation.

So, it seems to me, there is nothing inconsistent between the statement of any man who says that under the conditions set forth that a regular standing army of 300,000 would be sufficient and advocacy of a policy now of training men so that, in the event they are needed, they will be trained and ready for service when the time comes.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I have been listening to the arguments of my brethren in the Senate, and I desire to introduce here my own position. For 150 years there has been a tradition, almost an unwritten law, that during peacetime there should be no conscription, and, although we are not talking of that bill now, it seems to me that before we violate that tradition there should be a direct finding by the Congress that an emergency or crisis exists.

Colonel Knox, some time ago, as I understood what the Senator from Montana read, had one opinion and now has another opinion. That is not strange, for we are living in a very quickly moving world.

Mr. WHEELER. He made the statement when he was before the committee recently on the question of the confirmation of his nomination.

Mr. WILEY. That was about a month or 3 weeks ago. Even then I concede that there might be some difference. But the point is that Colonel Lindbergh said yesterday that if we were properly prepared we need never fear an attack, and the general of the Army said that we should give 50 of our ships to England in order to avoid the possibility of England going down, but none of those things covers the issue, as I see it. When Senators rise on the floor and suggest that someone has said we are in danger or that a crisis is upon us, that is not what we want. We want the facts. We know there are "four horsemen" abroad in the world—Germany, Italy, Russia, and Japan—who are ready to rape every other nation which they can overpower; and they are doing it. We know that they are literally dividing the world up among them. On the other hand, we know, so long as England stands and her navy is intact, that probably no other navy in the world could reach our shores to attack us. So what we want to know is the facts; what is the judgment of the men who know as to what England can stand?

We are told by Mr. Stimson that England will be gone in 30 days. If England is gone in 30 days, shall we prepare then? Will we be in the position to defend ourselves? We know that South America will probably be divided up if England goes down. So, if England goes down and South America is divided up, we come to the other great issue, which is, What is our foreign policy in the Western Hemisphere? Are we going to stick by the Monroe Doctrine and defend it from the southern tip of South America to Labrador or the North Pole? If so, are we prepared? Or are we going to say, "No; we are going to defend it as far as the most easterly tip of Brazil"? If that is the position, and England goes down, are we prepared? In other words, what are the facts, not what is the conclusion of some one who, probably, has only a smattering of the facts? I think that is what America wants, and I think that is what America is entitled to. America is entitled to have the facts discussed here, because, if we are going to set aside an ancient policy which is practically a rule of conduct in this Nation, we must do it on the basis of facts.

So, I should like when Senators rise and say there is an emergency, there is a crisis, these are the facts A, B, C, D, and so forth. That is what I think we should do, because, after this bill is over with we will consider the next bill, and when the next bill comes up, we should know what our foreign policy will be in case certain conditions shall obtain. For instance, our Navy is now in eastern waters. If the Panama Canal should be destroyed, what use would it be in the eastern seas? Those conditions we have to think about in determining what we are going to do on the subject of adequate preparation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. It ought to be stated, while we are dealing with facts, that Secretary Stimson did not say before the House committee that England was going down in 30 days. He was dealing with possibilities. Nobody can speculate as to whether England is going down at all or, if she is going down, whether it will be in 30 days. But, as I remember his testimony from the newspapers—and that is the only source I had—Secretary Stimson was dealing with the possibility that such a thing might happen; he did not say it would happen.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HILL. In reference to what the Senator from Kentucky had to say about the Regular Army, he put his finger on what, to my mind, is one of the most important things in this whole debate, and that is what we are seeking to do is to avoid the building of a great army in this country. Let me say that the War Department does not want a large Regular Army, and we will avoid that by training men under the other system which is now proposed so that they will be ready if we should need them.

With reference to the selective-service system, let me say further that the Congress of the United States asked George Washington to send to the Congress recommendations as to what, in his opinion, our military establishment should be. Washington spent many months studying the subject, and before sending in a report to the Congress consulted with those men who had been his best and most trusted lieutenants during the Revolutionary War. As the result of that study on the part of George Washington he sent to the Congress his recommendations as to what our military establishment should be, and we find in those recommendations the very idea and the very principle embodied in the selective-service plan which is now proposed.

Mr. WHEELER. If we follow George Washington with reference to that particular plan, we should follow him in other subsequent recommendations which he made, should we not?

Mr. HILL. I agree with the Senator. George Washington said that if there was a grave emergency in this country there might well be a third term in the Presidency; and I am delighted we are going to have a third term.

Mr. WHEELER. We may have it, but we may not; that is yet to be decided by the people. [Laughter.] But George Washington also said something about entangling alliances, did he not?

Mr. HILL. No; that was Jefferson.

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes.

Mr. WHEELER. George Washington said something about "entangling alliances" also.

Mr. HILL. No.

Mr. BARKLEY. He also said, "In time of peace prepare for war."

Mr. WHEELER. That is true, and nobody wants to prepare for war any more than I do; I am perfectly willing to do everything that ought to be done and I have voted to do everything that I thought was necessary to be done in the way of preparation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I believe in unlimited free speech and I want the Senator from Montana to say everything he has on his mind.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator would not want me to say everything I have on my mind.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; I would welcome it.

Mr. WHEELER. I was about to say that I think the only thing any of us differ about in regard to the training of these young men is with reference to conscripting them or having them enlist voluntarily. I say that if we have voluntary training and voluntary enlistments for 1 year and give the young men the same pay that we give the C. C. C. boys who have been taken out of the streets of New York and other cities, in my judgment we will get an adequate volunteer army for training purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas will yield at that point, the Senator from Montana does not put the C. C. C. camps, which are filled with young men taken from families that would otherwise be on relief, on the same basis and in the same category as the regular membership of the United States Army, does he?

Mr. WHEELER. We are paying the men of the United States Army $21 a month. We started out on that program when $21 had a much greater purchasing power than it has today. I think this great, rich Nation of ours ought to pay these men, when they go into the Army, more than $21 a month. I say that when we take into the Army a young man who may want to establish a home or may want to get married, it is miserly for the Government of the United States to pay him only $21 a month. It is not fair to the young man, and it is not fair to the Army; and, in my judgment, we shall not be able to get good men if we are going to keep the pay down to that figure.

Mr. BARKLEY. I may be prepared to agree with the Senator on the pay. I do not think there is a great deal of difference between $21 and $30—$9 a month—but it seems to me that is not the question with which we are faced. If Congress wants to pay the men $30 a month, that is one thing; but it seems to me it is another thing to take the position that in order to fight our battles—and, God knows, I hope we shall never have to fight any—but if we are going to have to fight any battles, it seems to me a little unfair to expect 130,000,000 people to be defended only by the adventurous spirits who are willing to rush in first and join the United States Army. I think there ought to be an equality of obligation among all the citizens of our country to defend the country, subject to such exemptions and exceptions as the law may wisely provide.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I have been listening to the debate, and I desire to know first whether we are debating Senate

Joint Resolution 286 or the bill which was reported out this morning by the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Technically, the National Guard bill is before the Senate; but we all know that the larger question of military training will soon be before us, and I welcome any contribution on that subject also.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I see. I could not understand what was being discussed.

At any rate, in reference to the statement made by our able friend from Montana, there is actually a distinction between the boys in the C. C. C. camps and those who would be offered the opportunity to enlist under the so-called conscription or volunteer bill which was favorably reported out this morning by the committee. That distinction is this: The boy who is in the C. C. C. camp gets $30 a month. He is provided with clothing and shelter and food and an opportunity to develop himself both physically and mentally, as are the men in the Army. The men in the Army, as the able Senator has just stated, are paid only $21 a month; but the distinction between the two insofar as pay is concerned is really the only distinction, in that the boy in the C. C. C. camp who gets $30 a month makes voluntary application for enlistment in those camps, but according to my understanding he is compelled to contribute $25 of the $30 to his widowed mother or his decrepit father or some dependent, whereas, on the other hand, those who have likewise volunteered for the United States Army and who receive $21 a month are not compelled to make any contribution whatsoever to the support of their dependents.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. If we have conscription, we shall probably take into the Army a large number of boys who have families, and who may want to contribute to their families just as much as the C. C. C. boys do; and we may take into the Army young men who want to get married, and who will want to contribute in similar fashion; so I do not think it is a question of whether they shall be compelled to contribute something to the support of their families, or whether the entire pay shall be given to the young men themselves. After all, as I said a while ago, when we fixed the pay of men in the Army at $21 a month, the purchasing power of the American dollar was much greater than it is today. I do not know on what date it was fixed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was fixed about 1920.

Mr. WHEELER. About 1920. The purchasing power of the dollar in 1920——

Mr. MINTON. Was less.

Mr. WHEELER. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. He will find that the purchasing power of the dollar has constantly lessened ever since 1920, except for a short time. Today, the purchasing power of the dollar is less than it was in 1920; and if we ask these boys to enlist and offer them $30 a month, in my judgment we shall get all the boys we want, providing they know that they are actually going to get some training, and are not just going to have to peel potatoes or shine somebody's shoes. I think such a plan will afford an opportunity for a great many young men to get real training. I am in favor of their getting training, but I am in favor of doing it in the traditional American way, by volunteers.

Mr. REYNOLDS and Mr. MINTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. May I answer the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from North Carolina wishes to reply. I yield to him.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, the bill which the Military Affairs Committee reported out this morning to the Senate offers that opportunity. As a matter of fact, the bill really should be entitled a volunteer bill, because it provides every man spoken of by the Senator a moment ago an opportunity to enlist in the Army if he is 18 or more, or 35 or less. It is really a volunteer bill. It is not, in a very large sense, a conscription bill.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know how the Senator can call it a volunteer bill. Under the bill, some persons will be permitted to volunteer.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Everybody from 18 to 35.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; but at the same time they are conscripted, because the conscription law goes into effect.

Mr. REYNOLDS. No; those who volunteer are not conscripted. They are merely volunteers.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; but the club is held over them that if they do not volunteer they will be conscripted.

Mr. REYNOLDS. No. I merely made mention of that for the reason that the Senator stated that it would be fine to provide American youth with an opportunity for advancement physically and mentally. In other words, it is a physical-culture bill.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. The Senator from Montana says that when the pay of the soldier was fixed at $21 a month the purchasing power of the dollar was much greater than it now is. I am sure he will accept the authority of the Senate to the effect that the purchasing power of the dollar now is just twice what it was in 1920. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] advises me that that is the fact. So it is not true, as the Senator from Montana says, that the purchasing power of the dollar now is less than it was in 1920. As a matter of fact, so the Senator from Oklahoma advises me, it is twice as great.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In June of 1920 the value of the dollar, based upon the average of 784 commodities, was approximately 65 cents. The value of the dollar at the present time is some 128 cents, measured by the same yardstick. By that measurement the dollar today has almost twice the purchasing power that it had in June 1920.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know anything about the statistics the Senator is quoting, but I know that if a man wants to buy a pair of shoes or a suit of clothes today, he will have to pay more for them than he would have had to pay in 1920. Perhaps the statistics mentioned by the Senator would apply to some wholesale commodities.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In connection with the discussion which has been opened by the Senator from Montana, it strikes me that there should be no difficulty about increasing the pay of soldiers and enlisted men in our Army unless it is the policy of the Congress that they should not be paid an amount equal to that which is paid either in the Civilian Conservation Corps or in the Navy.

The Chief of Staff, General Marshall, was before the Appropriations Committee this morning. He was there to testify with respect to the supplementary appropriation bill; but several questions were addressed to him by members of the committee who do not have the privilege of serving on the Military Affairs Committee with respect to the problem here under discussion and a similar problem.

I spoke to him about the discrimination which now exists in the pay of enlisted men in the Army as compared with the pay of those who enlist in the Navy, and I asked him if that was in accordance with the opinion of the Chief of Staff. He said it was not, that the Chief of Staff—he, the witness, General Marshall—believes that that discrimination should be eliminated. I asked him whether there was any doubt about that among the members of the General Staff as a whole, and he said there was not, that the General Staff has made that recommendation to the Congress. He said that as a matter of fact he had testified before the Committee on Military Affairs, which has just brought in this so-called conscription bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. At that point let me say to the Senator that our committee has under way an investigation of this very question, in connection with a bill introduced by me, S. 2224.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me complete this remark. I went to the Committee on Military Affairs after the Committee on Appropriations had concluded its session this morning, and I have in my hand a copy of the hearings held April 24, 1940, on the pay of enlisted men and warrant officers and commissioned officers of the Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Those were the hearings in connection with the investigation to which I referred.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. On page 13 I find, in the description of the disparity between the pay of those who enlist in the Navy and those who enlist in the Army, the following:

> Correction of disparities—First priority.—a. Base pay.—(1) Disparity: The Pay Readjustment Act established a disparity of $6 in the pay of the fourth grade (sergeants and petty officers, third-class) in the Army and Marine Corps ($54) as compared to the same grade ($60) in the Navy and Coast Guard. In like manner the act established a disparity of $12 in the pay of the fifth grade (corporals and seamen, first-class) ($42 for the Army and Marine Corps and $54 for the Navy and Coast Guard). The act also established a disparity of $6 (Army and Marine Corps, $30; Navy and Coast Guard, $36) in the pay of the sixth grade (private, first-class, and seaman, second-class).

Mr. President, it seems to me to be extraordinary that, while the great problem of building up the Army is being considered by the committees of this body, apparently little attention is being paid by the committees to immediate action to eliminate the discrimination which the Chief of Staff says should be eliminated.

Mr. SHEPPARD. We are doing the best we can.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado and Mr. LEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield first to the Senator from Colorado, and then I will yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether he has not been advised by the War Department that the Bureau of the Budget claims that it is not in line with the policy of the administration to increase the pay of enlisted men at the present time. Is not that a fact?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not recall for the moment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Did not Secretary Woodring inform the Senator that that was a fact; that the Bureau of the Budget said it was not in line with the policy of the administration?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not recall at the moment, but I shall ascertain what the fact is, and put it in the RECORD.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to say to the Senator from Wyoming that we have this question very closely at heart.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I realize that.

Mr. SHEPPARD. And we are doing the best we can to give it thorough consideration. We did not think it should be covered in the pending measure, but we thought it should be taken care of in a separate measure.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is exactly the point upon which I disagree with the amiable and able chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, because it is indissolubly associated with the question of conscription. It is the point upon which the argument is being made. I have read in the public prints that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] is planning to offer an amendment which will do away with this discrimination. If I am correctly advised as to what his intentions are, I wish to say that I think he is eminently right, that such an amendment should be agreed to, and that we should waste no time whatever in doing away with these disparities.

With respect to what the Budget Bureau had to say, it might quite possibly be true that last April the Bureau of the Budget felt that this was not in line with the financial policy which had then been established. Certainly that would be true of every one of the emergency appropriation bills which we have passed. The bill which is now before the Committee on Appropriations would never have been approved by the Bureau of the Budget last April. Things have been moving very rapidly in the last few months. The point is that we now have this measure before us, which has been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, and the pay of the men who go into the Army is of the essence of the whole measure. It seems to me that we cannot avoid handling that question.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator for his suggestions. They are very constructive.

I now yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. LEE. I wish to correct the impression the Senator from Wyoming has, as expressed by him, that the committee has not given consideration to the proposition of an increase in pay.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I did not mean to imply that at all. What I desire to say—and I think there can be no dispute about it—is that the bill has been reported by the committee without the inclusion of any provision doing away with this discrimination. Is not that correct?

Mr. LEE. On August 1, I offered an amendment to raise the pay of soldiers exactly to the penny in an amount sufficient to bring it in line with the figure just recited by the Senator from Wyoming, and due to a mistake the figures were printed according to the old schedule. This morning I secured the floor and made the correction and asked that the table be reprinted with the correct figures. At the time I presented the amendment I made a speech, very short, but along the same line, advocating the raising of the pay of soldiers. Before submitting the amendment I brought it up in the committee, and by a voice vote it was killed in the committee, or, rather, it was not agreed to.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is exactly my point, that the committee has not acted to eliminate the discrimination.

Mr. LEE. It was not agreed to. The Senator used the word "consideration." The committee did give it consideration.

I agree 100 percent with the statement of the Senator from Wyoming that we certainly should place the pay of soldiers on a par with the pay of C. C. C. boys, and should place the pay of soldiers on a par with the pay of men in the Navy. Certainly when we are considering compulsory military training we should raise the pay of soldiers to at least a minimum of $30 a month. I am glad the Senator brought that question up, because it calls more attention to it, and my amendment has been lying on the table for 5 days now, and at the proper time I shall offer it for consideration in connection with the military training bill. I agree with the Senator that it is a vital and an important part of the bill.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. We may have to consider a pay bill at some time or other, but now we are considering a bill to raise the quota of men, and I will ask the Senator from Texas whether we have not been advised time and again by the Chief of Staff, who has been quoted today by the Senator from Wyoming, that the pay question is a very involved one. It is one which cannot be settled by amendments offered on the floor of the Senate, or which we could tack onto a conscription bill such as that which was before the committee until this morning. There is a disparity between the Army pay and the Navy pay because in the Navy various grades and steps were created, because in the Navy technical men were used, and there were more places in which they could put technical men, and therefore they could create technical places for them, and increase their pay.

Until quite recently the Army had no such technical grades in which to put men, but now, with the prospective mechanization of the Army, it is possible that there will be various grades in which to put the men, and therefore we can place them on a parity with the men in the Navy. But that has been the difference. It was not a deliberate discrimination against the Army. The disparity existed because of the difference between the duties performed by men in the Navy and men in the Army. We all know that in the case of the old infantrymen—as we knew them even in the World War—there was nothing technical about them. They were all "buck privates," or corporals, then some sergeants, then some officers. There was nothing technical about it. But the Army is a different thing now. So, when we come to consider the question of pay, we are going to have to consider it in the light of the duties the men perform. While we may all have our hearts wrapped up in the welfare of the soldiers, and some may feel they are not getting enough money as they serve in the Army—and I am sometimes touched by the feeling my colleagues display in 1940 about the pay of soldiers—after all, that is all wrapped up in a very technical proposition which will have to be very carefully considered in connection with a bill directed to that point, and not in connection with proposed legislation such as that now before the Senate.

Mr. TAFT. Will the able and long-suffering Senator from Texas yield to me for a question?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield gladly.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator referred to the emergency which exists, and which apparently will become a military emergency in the event England collapses. Is the Senator able to advise me how many men he thinks should be under arms in this country, apart from the Navy, during the existence of that emergency? Are there any figures that can be given as to the total number of men that should be under arms?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think we should have, as soon as we can get them, between 600,000 and 700,000 men, if not a larger number.

Mr. TAFT. Under arms?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Under arms for defense purposes, and for training purposes, until we could raise an army equal to whatever emergency might develop.

Mr. TAFT. How many men does the able Senator think should be trained and in reserve in addition to the 600,000 or 700,000 men under arms?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think there should be at least four or five million.

Mr. TAFT. In reserve?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes.

Mr. TAFT. Do those figures represent the opinion of the administration today?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I cannot say as to that. The Senator asked me for my opinion.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I think my recollection is correct, and I think I can give the Senator the figures. General Marshall contemplates under this training program at the present time calling not in excess of 1,200,000 men.

Mr. TAFT. Assuming there is an emergency, or will be in the event Germany should overrun England, why will not that emergency last for the next 10 years? Why is not this a permanent situation we have to deal with rather than an emergency situation?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It may be. It may be prolonged. That is why I said four or five million men. It might even require a still larger number. It might require even the entire manpower of the Nation.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator, then, contemplates a direct attack on the United States by large armed forces from Europe?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I certainly do.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator think it is a practical thing to transport a million men, say, from Europe?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think it may be in 2 or 3 years. Rapid progress is being made in methods of transportation.

Mr. TAFT. In 2 or 3 years?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes. The Senator said the crisis might continue 10 years.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. GIBSON. Is the figure 600,000 or 700,000 meant to refer to the Regular Army, or is the National Guard included?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Army of the United States, which means the Regular Army, the National Guard, the Officers Reserve Corps, the Enlisted Reserve, and so forth.

Mr. GIBSON. So the Senator's contention is that 600,000 or 700,000 men, consisting of 375,000 Regular Army and 250,000 National Guard is sufficient for our regular standing force?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Only as an initial protective force, as I tried to explain. We would increase that number from the great reservoir we are trying to develop through training.

Mr. GIBSON. So the figure, 1,200,000, of which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] spoke, is a figure which the Army has in mind as being a regular standing army for a period of time?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; I think that refers to a second force. We have the permanent initial protective force, and then the additional increases are determined by the necessities. But it is very necessary that we have a reservoir of trained men who would be eligible for service in order to meet the necessities.

Mr. GIBSON. Then, it is not intended to increase the authorized strength of the regular standing Army of the United States; is that correct?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Oh, yes; for the emergency. We have already increased it from 165,000 a few years ago to 375,000 now—the figure now authorized. We have, however, actually in the Army today about 260,000 men.

Mr. GIBSON. Then this proposed legislation will create a standing Army of 700,000 men for how long?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The pending measure, the National Guard measure, will continue to 1942, and the military training bill will continue for 5 years. One is for 2 years and the other for 5 years. But personally I think the emergency will be of longer duration than that, and call for continued legislation.

Mr. GIBSON. If the National Guard units are not to be called out immediately is there any reason why the War Department cannot lay down a plan to be incorporated in the joint resolution, so that National Guard men may be advised when they may be called out, and business and professional men and other men in the National Guard of the State of Vermont may be told definitely that within a reasonable time they may be expected to be called out in order that they may make their plans?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think the Department is arranging to give this notice or is preparing to do so as soon as the joint resolution passes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. There seems to be some confusion about the relationship between the present authorized standing Army, the National Guard, and the trainees contemplated under the military training measure. As I understand, we have authorized the creation of a regular permanent standing Army of 375,000 men.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. In addition, we have heretofore provided that the National Guard shall be a part of the armed forces of the United States.

Mr. SHEPPARD. A part of the Army of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. So when we add the present National Guard membership, which may be called out under the provisions of the joint resolution, to the 375,000—which we have not yet, but will get, and are taking at the rate of 16,000 a month—and then add all the reserves, we shall have between 600,000 and 700,000 men.

Mr. SHEPPARD. A little more; probably 750,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. The 1,200,000 referred to by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] are not a part of the Regular Army. At the end of their training period they will go back into civil life, and if there is no increase in the emergency and no war the probability is that they will not be called back into service again. In the meantime others may be trained, and they will go back into civil life if the emergency shall have ended or shall not have increased.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Quite true.

Mr. BARKLEY. So the men who are to be trained under the provisions of the joint resolution are not to be called into or become a part of the Regular Army of the United States unless, and only unless, we are in a war or under a compelling emergency which would require that they serve longer than the period of their training.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I so understand.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. GIBSON. Is it the purpose not to increase the size of the Regular Army beyond 375,000?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I cannot say definitely, because we never know one day what the next day may bring forth.

Mr. GIBSON. Is that the present aim?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is the present aim.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the present law.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is the maximum toward which we are now working.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLT in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to answer the question of my good friend the junior Senator from Vermont, which I do not believe was quite adequately answered a few moments ago.

The Chief of the National Guard Bureau, Major General Williams, came before the Committee on Military Affairs and asked permission, immediately upon the passage of the joint resolution, to call certain designated units. Those units are designated in advance. They include 3,930 officers, 53 warrant officers, and 55,426 enlisted men. The proposal is immediately to commence intensive training for the Regular Army, which is now said to be 263,000, and for the additional units, which will bring into intensive active training a little more than 318,000 men.

I have listened to my distinguished friend, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and others who have participated in this debate. I do not think we can afford to speculate on the security of the people of the United States of America. I think we must have this training, and we must have it immediately.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. GIBSON. I appreciate what the Senator from Kentucky has said. I should like very much to know in advance as the men from New York and New Jersey now know, about when the National Guard men in Vermont may be expected to be called into service. Those of the Forty-third Division, made up in northern New England, have no idea when they may be expected to be called out. Many of them have to make plans to be away from their professions, their businesses, and their homes; and it takes time to get ready to go away for a year; so I think they should be informed as quickly as possible. I thought perhaps it might be wise to put in the legislation a provision that the War Department should formulate such a plan and give plenty of notice to the men.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The War Department has such a plan.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas a question for the RECORD. I realize how patient he has been, and I do not wish to cause any delay, but this is a very important matter.

I have received a letter from the Governor of Massachusetts, reading as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE HOUSE,
Boston, July 25, 1940.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, Jr.,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Legal authorities in this State inform me that there is some doubt as to whether or not the Governor can organize a State home guard when, as, and if the National Guard is called into Federal service, provided that a state of war does not actually exist when the Federal Government does so call the National Guard. I have noted a letter of the Governor of the State of New York to Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD and Representative ANDREW J. MAY with relation to the same subject. It becomes most important for the joint resolution that is authorized by Congress on this subject to cover this point. Under our State law there is ample authority for me to organize such a home gaurd. Under the Federal law there is doubt unless the country is actually at war.

I know that you will agree with me that if our National Guard is called into Federal service it becomes necessary, in order to carry out the responsibility of the executive office in the Commonwealth, to organize a home guard. We are setting up a tentative organization at this time in order to be prepared and it certainly would be most unfortunate and difficult for the executive office in this State to have Congress not make this point clear when it passes a resolution calling the National Guard into Federal service.

I would appreciate it if you would give this matter your personal attention and keep it clearly before you.

With kind regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

LEVERETT SALTONSTALL,
Governor of the Commonwealth.

I should like to ask the Senator whether or not it is contemplated to take any steps to remove the doubt which apparently now exists as to the power of a Governor to organize a home guard.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have telegraphed Governor Lehman that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs will take up that matter at its next regular meeting on next Friday, and will consider a bill I have introduced on the subject, and also a bill which I think the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] has introduced.

Mr. LODGE. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Since I have been in the Chamber there has been some discussion with respect to the trainees. Am I correct in my understanding that if the National Guard is called out, a certain number of the trainees will be trained under National Guard organizations as well as under the Regular Army?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true.

Mr. LUCAS. One further question: Do the trainees who go into the National Guard camps or into the camps of the Regular Army throughout the country assume the same military status as the soldiers with whom they are training?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; they do.

Mr. LUCAS. In other words, when one of the trainees goes into training for a year, if an emergency should arise during that time he would be a soldier for all intents and purposes, and would go right along with the organization?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is my understanding.

I promised the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] to look up the matter of the opinion of the Bureau of the Budget on the interdepartmental pay bill, and also the Army pay bill. I find that on February 19, 1940, Mr. Woodring wrote me in reference to the interdepartmental pay bill in part as follows:

A copy of this report was submitted to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, who, after taking the matter up with the President, informed the War Department that the enactment of legislation as proposed in either the majority or minority reports should be postponed for the consideration of a later Congress.

On July 14, 1939, he wrote me in part, as follows:

The War Department has consistently adhered to the view that the problem of pay adjustment should be approached through a consideration of the situation of all classes of personnel of all services. The Department has heretofore favored adjustments which would improve the pay situation of the enlisted men of the Army and remove existing disparities in the rates of base pay and rates of increase for length of service as between the pay of enlisted men of the Army and that obtaining in other armed services. However, the Bureau of the Budget has advised me that the proposed legislation would not be in accord with the program of the President and for that reason the War Department must refrain from comment upon the merits of the bill.

As I previously stated, the entire matter is still under consideration by the Senate Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I understood the chairman of the committee to state that in the event any member of the National Guard has dependents, or for some reason wishes to apply for a discharge and not take the year of training, the War Department would be willing to let him do so.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If he makes a good case; yes.

Mr. FRAZIER. I notice on page 1, line 9, the language, "with or without their consent."

Mr. SHEPPARD. The matter of allowing individuals here and there to retire from the service is not inconsistent with that statement.

Mr. FRAZIER. So it is understood that those who have dependents, and cannot very well give up their jobs and take a year's training, may apply for discharge and be discharged?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think they may, if they make a proper case.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. On the point about which the Senator from North Dakota has been inquiring, with reference to the language "with or without their consent," it will be noted that it refers back to the various Reserve components, including, of course, the retired personnel of the Regular Army.

Lately the Congress passed an Army promotion bill which provided for the number of officers of the Regular Army and reduced the retirement age to 60. In case of emergency, retired officers may be called back to active service whether they want to return to the service or not, because that is part of their contract with the Government of the United States.

The other question about which we seem to be so much worried hinges upon the theory of deferment. We all should keep in mind the fact that the National Guard will be called in as a unit as now constituted in regiments, brigades, or divisions; that the National Guard is never a full component at any time but is maintained on the theory of keeping a skeletonized reserve. In talking with officers of the General Staff and going over this particular measure, it was shown that authority should be given the President to call the National Guard into active service so that we would find out exactly what we had in the National Guard. Ordinarily a company whose full quota in time of war is as high as 200 men numbers approximately 60 men with a full complement of officers. When such a unit is called into the Federal service it goes into the Federal service as a unit, but the individuals within that unit come in as individuals.

I asked General Marshall if it were not true, judging from what we went through in the calling of the guard for service on the border, and then later calling the guard into service into the Army at the time of the World War, that the whole spirit of the selective-draft theory would be followed so that men who should properly be deferred would be deferred. Thus, after a unit has been brought into active service, after the proper deferment has taken place, there will be more of a skeleton organization than at the present time. It will be upon that reduced skeleton organization on which the expansion for training and for service will be built. Thus it is entirely proper that the pending joint resolution should be considered first before we take up the selective-service measure. If we always keep in mind that we can never tell anything about the military force of the United States until the units which comprise them are actually called into service, after deferment under the selective theory, then we can start building up the Army and training it.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. On page 3, line 3, I heard the Senator in his explanation interpolate, after the word "employer", some additional language which, as I understood, at least, included the words "in interstate commerce". I do not find that language in the joint resolution. I wonder where the Senator from Texas got the language.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was in the joint resolution at first, and I am sure it has been omitted by error. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to it.

Mr. DANAHER. It is not in the star print of the joint resolution before us.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well, I will ask that the language be restored.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I may say that in the original amendment the words "interstate commerce" were included, but the joint resolution as it was finally reported by the committee reads just as it is now before the Senate, and the words "interstate commerce" were not included.

The reason for that was that it was assumed when first the idea of using the words "interstate commerce" was conceived that this provision of the measure was built around the commerce clause of the Constitution and the rights under it, but the grant of authority to organize the military forces of the United States, to build armies, is such an all-embracing and all-inclusive grant that it was assumed it went further than the commerce clause and that it was not necessary to include the words "interstate commerce," as the military grant was greater, and included, of course, the commerce section.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. The Senator from Utah now is slightly at odds with the Senator from Texas in that the Senator from Utah has explained that there is no necessity for the words "interstate commerce" on the ground that this section of the joint resolution will not depend upon the commerce clause of the Constitution, while the Senator from Texas, in answering my query, said that the omission was an oversight and he intended to restore the language. I will be very happy to have a reconciliation of the two views.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I say to the Senator that I shall endeavor to reconcile myself with the Senator from Utah, and that we shall reach an agreement.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. Before the Senator proceeds about the National Guard, may I make a comment on page 1 of the joint resolution in line 6, which reads:

> The President be, and he is hereby, authorized to order into the active military service of the United States for a period of 12 consecutive months, any or all members and units—

And so forth. I understand it is not the intention that the President shall be limited to one call or order, but that he may make them from time to time, and that in each case it shall be for 12 months. I suggest, if that is the intention, that the language be changed so as to insert, after the words "twelve consecutive months", the word "each"; otherwise it might be considered that the President has exhausted his power when he has once ordered any part of the National Guard into active service for a period of 12 months.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have no objection to that suggestion, and when we reach the order of amendments I shall be glad if the Senator will offer such an amendment.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. OVERTON. That was the question which I propounded to the able Senator from Texas this morning during his presentation of the matter.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I recall the question, and I think the Senator will agree with me that the Senator from Rhode Island makes a good suggestion.

Mr. OVERTON. My thought in the matter is that when one is vested with discretionary authority, and he once exercises the authority, he cannot go back and reexercise the authority. I think that objection should be covered by inserting the words "authorized from time to time to order," and so forth.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Louisiana or the amendment suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island when we reach the order of amendments. In the meantime I shall try to confer with these Senators.

Mr. OVERTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. At the top of page 2 the joint resolution provides that the members and units—

> Shall not be employed beyond the limits of the Western Hemisphere except in the Territories and possessions of the United States, including the Philippine Islands.

Does that indicate an intention or a possibility of using them throughout South America? For instance, could troops be sent to Brazil or the Argentine?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I cannot answer the Senator's question authoritatively nor officially, but, under that language, the authority would be there. It reads:

> shall not be employed beyond the limits of the Western Hemisphere.

I think the language itself would authorize the sending of troops to any part of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. TAFT. Could the Regular Army be sent to Brazil or Argentina, for instance, without any further authority from the Congress?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It could be sent anywhere in the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. TAFT. So that, even though Congress has not declared war, even though there has been no declaration of war or of the existence of war, an army could still be sent, without further reference to Congress, to Brazil or Argentina or any other friendly country?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; but I do not think the President would exercise such authority without coming to Congress.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I shall submit at the appropriate time an amendment to meet that condition. I shall be glad to have it read and lie on the table until that time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all of section 1 beginning with the words "the Western Hemisphere" in line 5, page 2, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

> Continental United States and Territories and possessions of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. ADAMS. I will simply say that the purpose of the amendment is to restrict the power of the President with regard to those who are to be brought into the service under this joint resolution, so that they can be sent to service only within continental United States and Territories and possessions of the United States, so that they cannot be sent to foreign countries or to other places, including Patagonia and Tierra del Fuego.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do.

Mr. GILLETTE. Before the distinguished Senator takes his seat, may I propound a question or two to him?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETTE. I will say to the Senator that I am trying to get into my mind the basic purposes of the joint resolution.

The present law on the statute books permits the President, when Congress shall have declared a national emergency to exist, to call any or all of the National Guard units into service anywhere, at any place, for the duration of the emergency. That is the present law, as I understand; is it not?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let me suggest that that is not the law which applies to the situation. This joint resolution deals with the National Guard of the United States, not with the National Guard. They are two different institutions, although the personnel may be exactly identical. If the Senator wishes, I will call his attention to that act.

Mr. GILLETTE. I shall be very glad to have the information.

Mr. AUSTIN. I read from section 71 of the National Defense Act, and it is found at page 96 of this green compilation entitled "The National Defense Act." I read:

> In this act, unless the context or subject matter otherwise requires:
> (a) "National Guard" or "National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia" means that portion of the Organized Militia of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, active and inactive, federally recognized as provided in this act and organized, armed, and equipped in whole or in part at Federal expense and officered and trained under paragraph 16, section 8, article I, of the Constitution.

That is the part of the guard to which the distinguished Senator from Iowa has just referred. But the other provision, namely, subsection (b), reads:

> "National Guard of the United States" means a reserve component of the Army of the United States composed of those federally recognized units and organizations and persons duly appointed and commissioner in the active and inactive National Guard of the several States, Territorities, and the District of Columbia, who have taken and subscribed to the oath of office prescribed in section 73 of this act, and, who have been duly appointed by the President in the National Guard of the United States, as provided in this act, and of those officers and warrant officers appointed as prescribed in sections 75 and 111 of this act, and of those persons duly enlisted in the National Guard of the United States and of the several States, Territorities, and the District of Columbia who have taken and subscribed to the oath of enlistment prescribed in section 70 of this act.

It happens that under the law the same man may have taken both oaths and may be concurrently a member of the National Guard and also a member of the National Guard of the United States. But it is not necessary to have the conditions occur for the calling of the National Guard of the United States which must occur for the calling of the National Guard.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, he has just defined the National Guard of the United States from his pamphlet.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETTE. The present law provides:

> When Congress shall have declared a national emergency and shall have authorized the use of armed land forces of the United States for any purpose requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army, the President may, under such regulations, including such physical examination as he may prescribe, order into the active military service of the United States, to serve therein for the period of the war or emergency, unless sooner relieved, any or all units and members of the National Guard of the United States.

That is the present law.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; and that refers to the other guard. There are two powers. One is the power to call and the other is the power to order, and in order that the President may call there must be an act of Congress declaring that an emergency exists.

Mr. GILLETTE. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. And there is something else, if I remember correctly.

Mr. GILLETTE. That refers to the National Guard of the United States. Section 81 (a) makes the additional provision that in case the United States is invaded or in danger of invasion, or there is rebellion against the United States, or the President is unable to execute the laws he may of his own motion, within certain territorial limitations, call into the service any or all of these units. Those are the provisions of the present law.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETTE. I am trying to get at the purpose of the proposal now before us. We have these other provisions on the statute books. Is it the intention of those sponsoring the proposal before us to limit the right of the President to call the units of the National Guard, if this measure shall become law, to 12 months, and to limit it to certain territorial definitions?

Mr. AUSTIN. I should answer that in the negative. I think this is for an entirely different purpose from that contemplated by any of the laws now on the statute books.

Mr. GILLETTE. Is it then the purpose of those urging the joint resolution to add to our present statutory law a provision to permit the President in his own discretion, as he wills, and in the manner and at the time he wills, to call any units of the National Guard into service anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, if the measure is not amended as suggested by the Senator from Colorado for a limit of 12 months? Could the President, if this becomes a law as it is now presented, order the National Guard of New Hampshire to Rio de Janeiro for 12 months and permit the National Guard of Iowa to remain in this country?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, there are several questions in the Senator's interrogatory, and when I say "No," I am answering the one I understand to be the last, namely, could the President order the National Guard of New Hampshire anywhere? I say, "No; he has not any authority whatever over the National Guard of New Hampshire."

The proposal here is limited to the period which ends June 30, 1942. That takes care of the time element in the first part of the Senator's question. So that the President cannot "at any time" order out the National Guard of the United States. Within that period of time, from now until June 30, 1942, the President would be authorized to order into active military service for a period of 12 months—and that is a definite period—any or all members and units of any and all reserve components of the Army of the United States. That is all I call attention to.

As has already been very clearly stated—

> The Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Organized Reserves, and the Enlisted Reserve Corps.

If the event had already occurred that Congress had exercised its authority and authorized the President to call the National Guard out, either to enforce the law, to repel an invasion, or to suppress an insurrection, then the National Guard would be in the Federal service. On the other hand, if Congress had exercised its authority under existing law and declared an emergency to exist and the President had called out the National Guard, that would be the National Guard in Federal service. So we have perhaps the same identical men in two different capacities mentioned here in what constitute the reserve components of the United States Army, and the joint resolution deals only with them.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas continue to yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield the floor.

Mr. MALONEY obtained the floor.

Mr. GILLETTE. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. GILLETTE. With the narrowing of the definition of the National Guard of the United States, would it be possible under the law, if there is a unit of the National Guard of the United States in Vermont, for the President to order them into service for 12 months at Rio de Janeiro and not order into the service the National Guard from Indiana, or Virginia, or Nebraska, or Iowa?

Mr. AUSTIN. Of course, we are dealing in the measure before us with nothing but the National Guard of the United States, and in order to have the question apply to this joint resolution, we must have had the Vermont unit federalized. Assume that step has been taken, and the Vermont unit is a part of the National Guard of the United States, or assume that these other powers have been heretofore exercised and it has become federalized; then the President could order that part which he determined necessary anywhere within the limits of the Western Hemisphere. I must read the proviso in order to get that correct. It reads:

> Provided, That the members and units of the Reserve components of the Army of the United States ordered into active Federal service under this authority shall not be employed beyond the limits of the Western Hemisphere except in the Territories and possessions of the United States, including the Philippine Islands.

I do not think that requires any interpretation. That is perfectly clear.

Mr. GILLETTE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. AUSTIN. I may say before I take my seat that it is my intention to offer an amendment to the amendment in this measure at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield that I may ask the Senator from Vermont a question?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I ask the question solely for information. I understand that a State unit known as the Vermont National Guard, for instance, upon taking the oath prescribed, as I understand, under the Defense Act of 1920, becomes federalized. When it becomes federalized, does it lose its character as a National Guard unit of the State of Vermont, or does it continue to have both capacities?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, it continues to have both capacities, in my opinion.

Mr. WHITE. What troubles me is that, as I understand, the constitutional provision is that the militia of the State of Vermont, which I take it to be the National Guard of the State of Vermont, can be called out only upon the authority of the Congress for three definite purposes, to which the Senator made reference but a short time ago, that is, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and to repel invasion. Now because they have become federalized, may the National Guard of Vermont be used for some other purpose than those three, which I will not again attempt to state, which are named in the Constitution?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I understand that they may be; that the Congress, by the National Defense Act, has made them components of the Military Establishment.

Mr. WHITE. So that by that federalizing process we have lifted the Vermont units of the National Guard out from under that constitutional limitation; have we?

Mr. AUSTIN. No. If that National Guard is treated as the militia, the Constitution must be obeyed. Until the State regards its National Guard as no longer the militia, and creates a militia independent of it, I assume that under our practice, the National Guard will be regarded as the militia of constitutional standing.

Mr. WHITE. And they may be called out only for specified purposes. But when they have taken a Federal oath, I understand they may be called out for additional and other purposes. Am I correct about that?

Mr. AUSTIN. I may call attention to section 73 of the National Defense Act, which undertakes to deal with this question to some extent. There is set forth the oath that is required, and then this comment:

The President is authorized to appoint in the same grade and branch in the National Guard of the United States—

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to make an inquiry?

Mr. AUSTIN. In the middle of this reading?

Mr. ADAMS. I have not been able to hear the colloquy, which probably is in answer to my inquiry. Not having the benefit of membership on the Military Affairs Committee, I have been somewhat in doubt. The Constitution says that Congress may provide for the calling out of the militia to execute the laws, suppress insurrections, and repel invasion.

Mr. AUSTIN. I was in the midst of reading a sentence when this matter was suddenly interposed. What is the relevancy of this to the matter I was reading?

Mr. ADAMS. I did not hear what the Senator was reading. He was addressing himself to the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not want to disturb the equanimity of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AUSTIN. I was on my feet engaged in a colloquy with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], and I find myself suddenly off the floor without my consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can explain that situation. The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] yielded to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] for the purpose of asking a question of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], and neither the Senator from Iowa, nor the Senator from Vermont, nor the Senator from Maine had the floor in their own right. The Senator from Texas had the floor in his own right, and then when he surrendered it, the Senator from Connecticut obtained the floor, because he had been waiting all day to obtain the floor and to make a speech. The Senator from Connecticut yielded to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and the Senator from Iowa finished his question, and then the Senator from Connecticut yielded to the Senator from Vermont. That is the situation now, except that now the Senator from Colorado asks the Senator to yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I withdraw my request for recognition. I was merely seeking to obtain some light on a complicated situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has explained to the Chair that he was in the midst of making an answer to a question. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Vermont for that purpose?

Mr. MALONEY. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator from Connecticut for yielding. What I am about to read is more responsive than anything I have thus far said:

The President is authorized to appoint in the same grade and branch in the National Guard of the United States any person who is an officer or warrant officer in the National Guard of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia and who is federally recognized in that grade and branch: Provided, That acceptance of appointment in the same grade and branch in the National Guard of the United States by an officer of the National Guard of a State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, shall not operate to vacate his State, Territory, or District of Columbia National Guard office.

Officers or warrant officers of the National Guard who are in a federally recognized status on the date of the approval of this act shall take the oath of office herein prescribed and shall be appointed in the National Guard of the United States in the same grade and branch without further examination, other than physical, within a time limit to be fixed by the President, and shall in the meantime continue to enjoy all the rights, benefits, and privileges conferred by this act.

I think that is responsive to the question.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 2493) to provide for the operation of the recreational facilities within the Chopawamsic recreational demonstration project, near Dumfries, Va., by the Secretary of the Interior through the National Park Service, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 3929) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Memphis, Tenn., disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. CHAPMAN, Mr. KELLY, and Mr. HOLMES were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message further announced that the House, having proceeded to reconsider the bill (H. R. 7737) to amend the Judicial Code by adding a new section thereto, designated as section 266a, to provide for intervention by States in certain cases involving the validity of the exercise of any power by the United States, or any agency thereof, or any officer or employee thereof, and for other purposes, returned by the President of the United States with his objections, to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, it was—

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

SELECTIVE-SERVICE COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I am today submitting for the consideration of the Senate an amendment in the nature of a substitute for Senate bill 4164, although as yet Members of the Senate have not had an opportunity to examine or study the bill in its final form.

I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute which I have offered may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I have not offered many changes in the proposal studied and prepared by the Committee on Military Affairs, but I have suggested changes which, in my judgment, are extremely important.

I should like to emphasize the fact that in this proposed substitute or change I cannot claim authorship and I have no pride of composition. What I have tried to do is to incorporate in a bill, or substitute, suggestions made by others, in the hope that we may prevent delay of a matter that is of paramount importance to our country. This substitute has necessarily been hurriedly put together, and I am certain that it is not only subject to correction and perfection, but that it will need change.

I have been prompted by a desire to do what I can to establish and maintain national unity. A proper national-defense program without national unity is next to impossible, and without national unity it would be delayed. The dangers confronting us, or the possible dangers confronting us, will not permit of delay, and I am sure that every Member of the Senate and practically all our fellow Americans are not only anxious but will be insistent that we accelerate our deliberations and hurry to a decision on this exceedingly important matter.

My proposed substitute would not delay the enactment of the bill or the program with which the Military Affairs Committee and the administration are so vitally concerned. It would not delay selective compulsory military training if we finally determine that compulsory military training is necessary. What it would do, Mr. President, is afford the young men of the country a chance to volunteer. I am not sure that that is the best approach to our great problem, but I do know that tens of thousands of our countrymen feel that we should endeavor to build up our national defense insofar as the Army is concerned in what has been referred to as the traditional way. If we can do that without delay it might be more desirable, because it might strengthen our position of national unity, and national unity is necessary. The last thing we want is a dictated national unity, and I cannot say that without reminding my colleagues of the Senate that during the past several years every human effort has been made by the national administration to avoid dictated national unity. President Roosevelt himself has yielded in many difficult situations because of his insistence and determination that dictation from any source be avoided. He knows, certainly as well as any other American, how great is our danger, and he has said in connection with the matter which we are now considering that he favored, in principle, the suggestion before the Military Affairs Committee. He further insisted that the way of working it out was the responsibility and duty of Congress.

My suggested change makes provision for voluntary enlistments in the Army. It would increase the base pay of soldiers from $21 a month to $30 a month; and while this may incidentally encourage enlistments, its principal purpose is to give just treatment to the young men who offer themselves to the service and protection of their country. Unless and until their pay is increased they are suffering from discrimination. No one intended a discrimination; but it has been pointed out that those enrolled in the Civilian Conservation Corps are now receiving a greater remuneration than are the young men of the Army. It has also been pointed out that the military forces are paid less than are the naval forces. This is obviously unfair, and a definite effort to rectify the mistake has been too long delayed.

The proposal I offer aims to find out whether or not we can obtain the required number of young men for the Army through voluntary enlistments. It does not, however, delay the necessary aims of the Army or the country, because if the volunteer program does not measure up to the expectations of those who feel that that is the proper procedure it permits the operation of the selective compulsory military training program worked out by the Military Affairs Committee. The substitute, as does the committee measure, sets up all the machinery for the selective-compulsory plan, but delays putting it into effect until it is proven necessary. The substitute also liberalizes or extends the provision relating to men who are devoting their lives to the church, and that seems to me of like great importance. Certain other nations of the world have turned their backs upon religion, and in my judgment the existing turmoil is due in a large part to that horrible misfortune. Here in the United States—the last dwelling place of light and the refuge of freedom—we should make every effort not only to preserve religion but to extend it. No people can have too much religion, regardless of the faith they profess; and if religion should fail here in any degree my hope would be lessened.

My proposal further suggests that we defer compulsory military training of undergraduate college students until they have had a reasonable chance to complete their education. I know that I need not point out that we are great and powerful because of our educational system, and that it is of importance that we do nothing to permit a set-back in that field. I have endeavored to make provision that young men allowed this deferred privilege may be given training while they are still in school. Circumstances requiring it, they would be called to service upon the completion of their college course.

At this particular time I shall not speak at length upon the substitute or the bill. I want to do nothing to delay the program or the plans. Actually, my effort is to speed them up. Principally my effort is to preserve and strengthen our necessary national unity. I have heretofore declared on the floor of the Senate that there is national unity in the totalitarian countries and that the people and the soldiers of those countries have an ideal, even though it be a base ideal.

In the United States there are some few persons who would set aside this entire plan and program. With their views I have no sympathy, although for their opinions I necessarily have respect. It is idiotic to think that we shall spend billions of dollars for national defense and neglect the training of young men who in an hour of emergency would be called upon to fill our forces and man our military equipment. I pray to God that there may never be need for any of these young men to go to war; and I say with all the sincerity I possess that I do not believe they will ever be called upon to go to war if we are properly prepared.

We should emphasize with all the force of expression we have that the bill is not designed to take us to war but rather to keep us out of war. It is a peace measure—nothing more or less. We cannot, however, be blind to the fact that we may be in danger. None of us can read the minds of those across the seas, but every Member of the Senate has heretofore admitted that there is a possibility of great danger to our country. That admission was made as we voted for large appropriations for national defense. I have been "up front" in the effort to provide funds for national defense. As a member of the Appropriations Subcommittees for the Army and Navy, I long ago pleaded for more money for educational orders and for additional funds to build up our forces in almost every instance. In some cases I have been able to obtain increases, and I think the RECORD will show that I was responsible, at least in part, for large increases for our air forces over those proposed by the Budget.

Let me say again, at the risk of criticism for repetition, that I am concerned with two things, one the need for speed and the other the need for national unity. I fear that unless we come quickly to an agreement we shall suffer a long-drawn-out debate which will tear at the emotions of our people and divide us at a time when we can afford it less than ever before in our history.

I know that if we were at war the young men of our country would rush to the colors, but I should not want to go to war to swell the ranks of the Army. I should not want a single mother's son to go across any sea to fight, and I have prayed that they may not be called upon to fight in defense of their own country at home, but I do want to be prepared. I should rather see my son sacrifice a short period of his life to be prepared than to make a greater sacrifice of one kind or another later.

I do not know whether or not it is true, but we have been told that one or more of the once great nations of Europe suffered the horror and bitterness of defeat because their politicians procrastinated and fell into the easy ways of procedure. The situation of the moment calls for courage, and I hope no Senator will ever be forgetful of the vision and the challenge of the founding fathers. I hope the spirit yet prevails—and I am sure it does—that "come the need" we are still ready, for the defense of all we love and cherish, to pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

ACTIVE SERVICE OF NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVE, AND RETIRED PERSONNEL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of Reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service.

Mr. PEPPER obtained the the floor.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. I should like to call up and have read by the clerk an amendment which I offered last week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 2, after line 16, it is proposed to insert the following:

"(b) The President shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, defer training and service in the land and naval forces of the United States of those members of the National Guard whose employment in industry, agriculture, or other occupations or employment or whose work in engineering, chemistry, physics, medicine, or dentistry are found to be necessary to the maintenance of the national health, safety, or interest. The determination of each deferment of training and service shall be made with regard to the status of the individual and shall not be made by deferring the training and service of individuals by occupational groups without regard to the status of the individual therein. The President is also directed under such regulations as he may prescribe to defer the training and service in the land and naval forces of those members of the National Guard in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their deferment advisable: Provided, That no deferment for any reason shall be approved except on application therefor by an individual member of the National Guard, in his own interest, and no deferment from service shall continue after the cause therefor ceases to exist. The President shall utilize the services of the National Guard Bureau of the War Department in the administration of this subsection (b), and the decisions of the Chief of the National Guard Bureau shall be final as to all applications for deferment of members of the National Guard."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that committee amendments are first in order.

Mr. BARBOUR. In other words, my amendment will be considered later?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. Committee amendments are first in order.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I realized that my amendment would have to be considered later, but I was anxious to have it read for the information of the Senate, so that it might be included in the RECORD of today.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which lies on the desk. I think it is in order, because it is an amendment to an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are several committee amendments, but the Senator from Florida now has the floor. When we come to the consideration of amendments, the committee amendments will be first considered.

Mr. PEPPER. I shall be glad to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first committee amendment will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in section 1, page 1, line 5, after the words "a period of", to strike out "not to exceed 1 year" and insert "12 consecutive months", so as to make the section read:

That during the period ending June 30, 1942, the President be, and is hereby, authorized to order into the active military service of the United States for a period of 12 consecutive months, any or all members and units of any or all reserve components of the Army of the United States, and retired personnel of the Regular Army, with or without their consent, to such extent and in such manner as he may deem necessary for the strengthening of the national defense: Provided, That the members and units of the reserve components of the Army of the United States ordered into active Federal service under this authority shall not be employed beyond the limits of the Western Hemisphere except in the Territories and possessions of the United States, including the Phillippine Islands.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont wish to offer an amendment to the first committee amendment?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment on page 2, line 18.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut desire to address himself to the first committee amendment?

Mr. DANAHER. As I understand, we are now to proceed with committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk has just stated the first committee amendment. If the Senator from Florida will yield, the amendment may be now considered.

Mr. PEPPER. No, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

COMMENTS ON COLONEL LINDBERGH'S SPEECH

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, even for a period of a very few minutes I would be reluctant to take the time of the Senate in the consideration of the pending bill, which I realize, after all, is the best practicable way of getting toward the objective for which I feel such very serious concern, but I do not want this day to pass without making some comment upon an address which was made yesterday from the great city of Chicago on a great subject over the radio by Col. Charles A. Lindbergh.

As I understood the colonel's address, he started off fundamentally with the proposition that the action of the German Government was largely justified because of the fact that Germany and the Central Powers were poor while the British Empire was rich and there had been a treaty of Versailles which gave also just cause for the course which has been followed by the German Chancellor and the German Government.

Thereafter the colonel proceeded to the further point that it was pretty obvious that Germany was about to win the war and that the United States should adapt itself to a world in which Germany stood supreme so far as the continent of Europe was concerned.

Then the colonel suggested to his country that it should be willing to participate in some measures that would tend to bring about world peace.

Mr. President, I attribute to every other person in the whole United States the same patriotism and the same sincerity which any Senator upon this floor, or any other person, would claim for himself. It is perfectly understandable that men will have differences of opinion which are equally honest. I am not at all surprised that Colonel Lindbergh should find in the German people and in the attitude and policy of the German Government many things that claim his wholehearted admiration.

I regard the colonel as one of the men of remarkable genius that this generation has produced; but I suggest that it is a mechanical genius, a dispassionate genius, which has never been particularly noted for its sentimentality, its sympathy, or its human qualities. So I can well understand how the colonel might have been vividly impressed with the meticulous methods for which the German people are famous; that the marvelous organization which has been exhibited by the ruthless German military machine must have had a great hold upon his affection and his admiration; and that the thoroughness and the scientific attitude with which the German official mind approaches every problem and brings it into harmony and synchronization with other things certainly must have seemed to him as almost human perfection. But I was somewhat astonished that a man holding the position which the colonel holds would venture to say to the American people that the course of the German Government was justifiable and to give, by implication at least, his benediction to their brazen efforts to do what they aspire to do. He gave, as a suggestion of justification, the Versailles Treaty.

Mr. President, when Bismarck provoked the war with Schleswig-Holstein and took that nation's territory upon his own initiative there was no Versailles Treaty; when the same Bismarck, a little later, provoked an unjustifiable war with Austria there were no Versailles Treaty; and when, in 1870, the German Chancellor, Bismarck, willfully and cold-bloodedly, for the purpose of bringing on war with France, forged a telegram in order to inflame his people so that they would support war, there was no Versailles Treaty, and Central Europe then was not a glaring example of poverty, while France and Great Britain were very glaring examples of bloated wealth and riches.

So, Mr. President, I can see running throughout the whole course of the German Government since Bismarck's day but one national ambition, namely, empire, conquest, gain, expanse by one doctrine alone—force; in all that time I have never seen the German Government stand before the world as an advocate of anything but force in the counsels of men except for a short time while that government was a member of the League of Nationos.

So it does not seem to me, Mr. President, however conscientious the able colonel may have been in the view which I know he seriously and honestly entertains, that he was justified in the assumption that all that Hitler and modern Germany under the Nazi Party have done has been justified by the Versailles Treaty. In 1914, indeed Mr. President, there was no Versailles Treaty that sent the German legions marching across the frontier of Belgium, which certainly was not a provocative, threatening nation against the German people.

So, if there was no Versailles Treaty in 1866, as I recall the date, in 1870, and in 1914 to justify the aggressions of the German Government, I am not very strongly persuaded that the Versailles Treaty was the occasion for taking Denmark and Norway, Holland and Belgium, and Luxemberg, which had nothing to do with that treaty, and many other nations which were the victims of that government's aggression.

Then, of course, the colonel said that the Germans were poor people and wanted territory upon which to expand. Poor old Chamberlain believed that argument. Perhaps he was disillusioned a long time ahead of the able colonel. Perhaps the colonel may, too, some day, be just another deluded Chamberlain sitting and sighing to himself over the wreckage of civilization.

I believed that man in what he said. I have no doubt that Chamberlain believed every word of Hitler at Berchtesgaden when he said he merely wanted to rescue a victimized German population who had artificially been created into an artificial state. He wanted to incorporate them into the Reich, which seemed to be a perfectly natural even a laudable ambition, one upon which men could not conscientiously differ, because our own President Wilson had said free determination, self-determination, are the right of the peoples of the earth.

So the world countenanced Hitler taking over Czechoslovakia and dismembering it, believing that Hitler meant what he said when he stated, "This is all the territorial ambition I have in Europe."

Then what did he do? A little later he took the remainder of Czechoslovakia, which had no claim whatever to being a part of the Reich.

The colonel says "but they are poor." Did Denmark have anything to do with their poverty? Did Norway have anything to do with it? Did some of the other countries which have been victimized, Belgium, for instance, have anything to do with their poverty? Why attack helpless and irresponsible people to right a wrong, even if poverty be the wrong inflicted upon them?

Mr. President, it does not seem that Colonel Lindbergh and Mussolini are at one in their argument as to why the German Government entered the war. When Italy entered into the war Mussolini made a hair-raising speech in which to the thousands and tens of thousands of gathered Italians, he said, "This is a phase of a world revolution." He did not speak about the poverty of Central Europe, but said it was a revolution that was going to overturn the existing order and put a new order in its place; that it was going to break down existing empires and set up new ones; it was going to unhorse people that had saved anything out of the past and substitute in their stead a people who gained by loot in this generation. Yet the colonel says, at least, by implication, that, because of the poverty of Central Europe, the Germans were driven into this great effort.

Mr. President, if poverty alone was the occasion of it, when are they going to be satisfied? How much will they have to take besides what they have already taken in order to satisfy their appetites for gain and conquest and loot? That is the reason some of us are concerned about this hemisphere. The German Government does believe in taking the property of those who have, and we happen to be one of those who have. So is South America. So they turn their lustful, greedy eyes upon every green spot upon the face of the earth and are going to try to trample it into their own subjugation.

But the most startling of all the comments the able colonel made was to state very clearly that he was not concerned about the issue of this war, for the reason that it was merely another land-grabbing contest between European powers, that, so far as we were concerned, we had nothing to do with it, that we were not concerned in its outcome, and we should not have anything to do with it or anything to say about it.

Mr. President, if the colonel were right in that premise, I would agree with him. The last thing in the world that I want to concern myself with or I want to see my Government concern itself with is a squabble involving the desire and effort of one nation to take territory from another nation in Europe. For that reason, I would favor in no sense ever sending abroad by this Government one soldier or sailor or marine or anybody else to fight in a struggle for territory on the continent of Europe.

But, Mr. President, for the colonel to say that this is just a land-grabbing contest between powers indicates that he has utterly missed the whole point of this war, because, as I said, Mussolini says it is a world revolution, and this is just a phase of it. Yet Colonel Lindbergh, speaking supposedly with great knowledge and background and perspective, says it is just a land-grabbing contest between European powers.

Mr. President, in this speech the colonel went one step further. He very definitely implied that we ought to live in peace and harmony and cordiality with Germany as the victor of this war; for, according to his hypothesis, it did not matter very much, anyway, which nation won; it would be the same kind of a world. We would not be affected by the issue of it, and therefore why should we concern ourselves about who won?

I just happened to pick up the Washington Star of yesterday, and on page A–14, in the first column, I read these headlines:

Totalitarian sweep has crushed labor in conquered lands.

I ask you to find a labor union in any country that has been conquered by Germany. Name one where the right of collective bargaining lives, where the right to strike lives.

I ask you to find, in all the territory that Germany has conquered, a free newspaper in which the right to print the truth according to the judgment and wisdom of the editor may be exercised.

I ask you, Mr. President, to find in the conquered territory that Hitler's iron heel has crushed an instance of the right of free speech without going to a concentration camp or being stood against a wall and shot.

I ask you, Mr. President, in all that broad land, that pathetic territory where the muffled sobs of crying babes and anguished mothers almost drown out every other sound, to find an instance in which the right of freedom of assembly exists.

I ask you, Mr. President—you who love God and worship Him—to find a free church in all that territory; to find a lodge of freemasons, where men may dedicate themselves to a cause of any kind that appeals to their conscience.

I ask you, Mr. President, where does free trade live in all that broad expanse? Where does any freedom, any liberty, live?

I do not like to make comparisons. I have never rested what I have ventured to say upon the virtues of Great Britain. I do not care whether anyone likes Great Britain or not, and I shall never strive to be an apologist for Great Britain. They have had their good qualities and their bad qualities, their noble days and their ignoble days; but, Mr. President, what Germany stands for is not the kind of thing that Britain has stood for as I read history, in modern times at least. So for the colonel to insult every intelligent man's opinion by asking him to believe that it makes no difference who dominates Europe and who wins this war is almost unthinkable for a man of his supposed intelligence.

These other nations have not threatened us with their spies. Go to a country in this continent and see if it is not infested with German spies. So far as I know the other nations have not done that. Go find the "fifth columnists" with their slimy, serpentine trail leading to the destruction, if possible, of every sacred institution we have. So far as I know, other nations are not threatening that. Find an evidence of other nations trying to strangle trade in the way that we know it, where free men may trade with free men even unto the ends of the earth. I do not know where it exists.

So, Mr. President, I am not surprised that the colonel has no horror about Hitler winning the war. To him the German Fuehrer no doubt holds up a worthy objective. Perhaps he would like to see life regimented in the way the Germans have regimented it, organized in the way they have organized it, conducted in the thorough way in which they conduct it. At least, Mr. President, I am led to that conclusion.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Of course, Colonel Lindbergh's theory is different from that which the able Senator from Florida is now expounding.

Today's Washington Daily News carries the following headline:

Lindbergh heads third party, Rome hears.

Under that is a report of the speech which the colonel made in Chicago yesterday. It states that Lindbergh said:

No foreign nation would desire to invade the United States if it does not interefere in such a nation's affairs.

He evidently predicates that wise and truthful assertion upon the fact that Germany did not desire to invade Holland, because Holland had not interfered in Germany's affairs; that Germany did not desire to invade Denmark, because Denmark had not interfered in her affairs; that Germany did not desire to invade Luxemburg, because that helpless little country had not interfered in Germany's affairs.

In view of all which, and many other similar facts, was not Colonel Lindbergh fully justified in assuming that Hitler would never desire to invade the United States?

Furthermore, according to this newspaper article, the colonel said:

European nations are fighting a war over the division of territory and wealth.

Had the Senator from Florida understood that there was any controversy between Germany and Belgium over the division of territory or wealth at the time Hitler overran that country; or that there was any controversy between Germany and Holland about territory or money, when Hitler destroyed Rotterdam; or that there was a controversy with Czechoslovakia over territory or wealth when Hitler's gangsters with armored trucks removed $100,000,000 in gold from Prague to Berlin after Germany had bathed the land of the unoffending Czechs with blood?

In brief, does not recent history prove that the colonel's premise is sheer nonsense and that the conclusion he draws from it is as false as the word of the military monster who is now terrorizing the world and revelling in the blood of slaughtered men?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I am very much indebted to the able Senator from West Virginia for the questions he has put. Neither one of those questions requires any answer from anybody on this floor or in this Congress, because I believe every well-informed citizen in America knows the clear-cut answer, and that the answer is "No," as the able Senator from West Virginia intimated in the way he asked the questions; that all history belies every conclusion that Colonel Lindbergh has reached in considering this situation.

But I was about to say, Mr. President, that I can well understand that Colonel Lindbergh's attitude is a little different from that of some of the rest of us. The colonel has not just become an admirer of Germany. The colonel has been an admirer of Germany for a long time, and the sentiments have been reciprocated to the extent that the hand of Mr. Goering—the man whose planes have murdered untold thousands of men, women and children, most of them noncombatants, since this war started—the very hand that pushed the button that destroyed countless families, and bathed Europe in blood, pinned the cross of recognition and merit upon the breast of Lindbergh. And now, while his breast is still warm with that embrace, without repudiating whatever heinous offense has later been committed by those who thus decorated him, he now dares to counsel America's people to feel his affection and admiration for that kind of a government!

So, Mr. President, as the Senator indicated, there must have been rejoicing yesterday not only in Rome but in Berlin. They must have chuckled with satisfaction as they heard those words coming from what was once America's most honored hero, a man whose magic journey to fame came about from his having flown an airplane that landed upon the soil that is now enslaved by the very nation which he admires and honors.

The other day, as the ship America approached the city of New York through the harbor, and the tugboats and the sirens and the city officials and the populace along the shores were shouting their enthusiastic welcome to that pride of our merchant marine, my heart was saddened, and I felt almost like retreating from the celebration, when my eye turned to the left, and I saw the Statue of Liberty standing there with hand outstretched and countenance benign, looking upon those who enter the harbor of our greatest city, when I reflected that that Statue of Liberty was put there by contributions voluntarily made by the children of France. So, Mr. President, France was at Yorktown, and French children held up the Statue of Liberty to all who come to this world of freedom from slavery abroad; yet I have not heard Colonel Lindbergh express any sympathy for the French or speak about their good qualities. I have heard of no tear falling from his eyes for a single child that has been the victim of Goering's Stukas and bombing planes.

Mr. President, this man who built a mechanical heart and gained renown for building a mechanical heart, I venture to say, reflects more the sentiments of a mechanical heart than a human heart.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ADAMS in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Colonel Lindbergh, this great aviator—and he is a great aviator—has distinguished himself as a flier more than anything else, but has the Senator heard of Colonel Lindbergh offering his service as a flier to his country in this great emergency, when one of the agencies we are trying so hard to build up is the air force of our country?

Mr. PEPPER. Knowledge of such an offer on his part has not come to my attention, at least. Perhaps the colonel might think that with such an obnoxious policy as the Congress and the executive officials of this Government have determined upon, perhaps he would not like to wear the uniform of this country, and I do not suppose he would be terribly frightened if news came that Hitler was at the boundary of America, because Colonel Lindbergh would know that at least Colonel Lindbergh would not be harmed under the Fuehrer of Germany.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. I do not think we should criticize the colonel for not having volunteered to enter the service indicated by the able senator from Indiana, because so far Lindbergh has not even offered to enlist in the flying corps of Germany, and if he would not enlist over there where his idols are, of course he would not enlist anywhere. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I hope that yesterday will be remembered; but that it will be remembered by the American people in a way different from that in which the able colonel would have them remember it. Instead of remembering the words of Colonel Lindbergh uttered yesterday, I hope the American people will prefer to remember the words that were uttered by an old man, one who has no ambition to satisfy, no fame to exploit, no grand future to challenge his efforts, an old man who has given his life to his country, wearing his country's uniform, who took the radio a little while after Colonel Lindbergh did, and who counseled his fellow citizens, in words of paternal affection, to beware, and not only to beware, but to take steps to defend their loved land against the known aggressions of the German people.

Mr. President, I suspect that General Pershing is a wiser counsellor to the American people about their security than is Colonel Lindbergh, because General Pershing has felt German steel, he has been in the armed service of his country, he knows the sinister power of Germany, and its ruthlessness. He has seen what the German Army can do upon Europe's soil. General Pershing is bequeathing to his people the legacy of his affectionate counsel, not to let the horror of that thing ever venture to come to their soil.

Mr. President, General Pershing has never had a medal from the head of the German Air Corps, he has never been embraced by the triumvirate that controls and dictates the policy of Germany. He has just been a leader of his own country's citizen army, which, in spite of all they would say about it, held off 25 years longer that devastating flame which is now threatening again to scorch the earth as it already has scorched Europe.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that if Colonel Lindbergh had not earned his German medal when it was presented to him he has by now earned it? [Laughter.]

Mr. PEPPER. I appreciate the sentiment of fair play which has entered into the remarks of the able Senator from Oklahoma, because naturally he is a straightforward American, who wants a man to have nothing he does not earn, and I know he indicates very strongly that there has been no gratuity in the bestowal of that medal upon our former eminent hero.

In perhaps a few hours, perhaps a few days, perhaps a few months, the people of this country will have to decide whether they are going to follow the chief of the "fifth column" in this country, America's ancient hero, Colonel Lindbergh, or whether they are going to follow the counsel of a man who is just as deep in the affections of his fellow citizens as he was the day he came back in command of his country's victorious armies—a man who by not one single act has diminished his stature in the esteem, the confidence, and the admiration of his people; a heroic figure who made a magnificent, heroic, lone, single-handed struggle against the grim reaper, Death, and won, as he won leading a citizens' army against the hordes of a German Kaiser who was the first Hitler of this generation.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, all I desire to say is that if we would turn back the pages of history to 1917, we could find almost the same words which have been uttered here this afternoon against Colonel Lindbergh, but they were uttered then against his distinguished father, Representative Lindbergh, who was also against war. We could find almost the same sentiment, almost the identical sentiment, and I fear the same result may occur in 1940 as a consequence of the same warmongering.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, in his radio address Colonel Lindbergh asked the United States to cooperate with Hitler. In other words, he would have us grasp Hitler's hand, slippery with the blood of human beings, and the colonel is critical of an administration which cannot grasp a hand dripping with human blood.

ACTIVE SERVICE OF NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVE, AND RETIRED PERSONNEL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of Reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment of the committee, on page 1, line 5.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON.]

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I did not know the Senator from Louisiana had entered the Chamber.

Mr. OVERTON. I am very grateful to the Senator from Texas for suggesting that the committee amendment be amended. The amendment I wish to suggest, if the Senator from Texas will yield to me for that purpose, is on page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized" to insert the words "from time to time."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, let the clerk state the amendment.

Mr. OVERTON. I have two amendments, which should be considered together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized", it is proposed to insert the words "from time to time."

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, as complementary to that amendment, on line 6 in the committee amendment, after the word "months," I move to insert the word "each," so that it will authorize the President "from time to time to order into the active military service of the United States for a period of 12 consecutive months each," and so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Did the Chair put the question on the first amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair put the question on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But one of the amendments was not to a committee amendment. The amendment in line 4 was not to a committee amendment. I will ask that the clerk read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized", it is proposed to insert the words "from time to time."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment was agreed to without objection. Now, the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Texas. I have been somewhat disturbed by this 12 consecutive months' provision. As I understand the situation, as the joint resolution is before the Senate, unamended, if the President calls into service a member of the National Guard, he must serve not less than 12 months or more than 12 months. In other words, regardless of what the emergency may be, the President may not continue him in service for another day after the 12 months has passed, and if the emergency disappears he may not release him. That is, the members of the guard are in for a full 12 months. In other words, there is a sacred period of 12 months which cannot be varied.

Mr. OVERTON. That is correct; but my amendment does not concern that provision. My amendment is merely to make it clear that the President can exercise the authority from time to time. It has nothing to do with the period of training or service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to take this occasion to state my views on the theory of the pending measure as I understand it.

In my judgment we should not provide for the service of these men in such broad language as is provided in section 2; that is, that they can be put to service anywhere in the Western Hemisphere. The theory on which I support this measure is that it will bring into service some 200,000 to 400,000 men, and beginning with men who are already partially trained, give them active training. I doubt whether that will be necessary. I do not believe it will be necessary. But if the Regular Army, enlarged as we have now enlarged it, is not sufficient, it seems to me the power given to the President by the joint resolution, if exercised, will result in practically doubling the standing Army in a very short time, or at least will train men who will be able to take the field as trained and seasoned men.

If we are opposed to universal compulsory military training the cry almost always goes up that we may be caught in an emergency without an Army large enough to defend our country until we can train a large number of men sufficiently so they will be fit for battle duty. I think there is something in that argument. It is a good argument if we admit that our standing Army is not sufficiently large to meet an emergency until we have time to train an army large enough to do the work contemplated. I support the theory out of respect for those who hold that opinion, even though I myself do not hold that opinion. I support it because I think the passage of this measure will be sufficient for present emergencies and ought to bring about the defeat of the compulsory military training bill, consideration of which will follow the enactment of the pending measure.

The object of the pending measure is to train a great number of men who are already partially trained, and add them to our Army. Personally, I do not see how an enemy army can succeed in invading our country without making great preparations for such invasion, which would take more time than would be necessary to train an army to defend our country. We must take into consideration that a foreign army must accomplish three things before it can successfully invade our territory. One is the destruction of our Navy, another is the destruction of our air force, and the third is the destruction of our standing Army.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LEE. Does the Senator believe that the United States should maintain the Monroe doctrine, that is, repel any attempt at settlement in or the establishment of a military base in South America?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, to begin with, I would not say that I think our country ought to be prepared to defend every foot of South and Central America and North America. It depends on where and how far one thinks the Monroe Doctrine ought to be applied. It has already been carried far beyond the point the President who first promulgated it had in view.

Mr. LEE. It is generally thought of as embracing the Western Hemisphere now, is it not?

Mr. NORRIS. It probably always did embrace the Western Hemisphere. I am not willing to say that I shall get behind the Monroe Doctrine in every emergency. For instance, if I can prevent it, I will not permit my country to become a collection agency, or to let any country in our hemisphere or in the other, take advantage of the Monroe Doctrine and deny the payment of its just debts or the performance of its honorable and just contracts. I do not want any other country to invade the Western Hemisphere or to establish a system over here similar to some of those in Europe.

Mr. LEE. If that is our policy and another country attempted to do what the Senator described, would it not be necessary in that case to have a military force strong enough to prevent such action?

Mr. NORRIS. That might be, but our first military force is our Navy. We voted for an increase in the Navy. I supported all that increase, and I believed in it, although I confess that I have changed my ideas from what they were 10 or 12 years ago, when I did not fully agree with the present theory with respect to the Navy. But conditions in Europe have arisen which I think have made us all sit up and take notice and to change some of our views.

We will not use a standing Army to prevent invasion until the three things I mentioned have happened. If Hitler attempted to establish a government in Mexico, or a base of supplies, then under any ordinary conditions I would be willing and anxious to go to the defense of Mexico and prevent such action. But it must be understood that in such case the battle would probably be fought mostly on the sea, and he would have to have a navy strong enough to overcome our Navy before he could accomplish his purpose.

Mr. LEE. Will the Senator again yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LEE. What the Senator says is true. But does not the Senator think it possible that if Germany should defeat England, the English Navy might fall into the hands of Germany, and then Germany, with the British Navy, and the German Navy, and the Italian Navy, and such units as are left of the French Navy, might outnumber our Navy, particularly at a time when we might not want to take all our Navy from the Pacific Ocean because of the situation existing there?

Mr. NORRIS. Very well, That might happen in the next 2 weeks, we will say. And suppose this measure is passed, what will it do to prevent that sort of thing if it does happen in 2 weeks? Of what benefit will the compulsory military training bill be if that thing does happen? If Germany defeats England and gets the English Navy and then has the Italian Navy and perhaps the Japanese Navy, she will have a preponderance. She may have that preponderance within the next 30 days, and if she attacks us with that combined fleet, she may defeat us. Then all the measures we are trying to pass here would not do any good to meet that kind of emergency.

Mr. LEE. Certainly not, but——

Mr. NORRIS. If Germany and her allies wait we will be better prepared when the appropriations we have made have been properly expended, and our Navy and our Air Force properly increased.

Mr. LEE. But the Senator just made the argument that he could not conceive of an emergency that might call for that increase.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe that emergency is going to happen. It looks dark for England. She may probably be defeated. But my own idea is, Mr. President, that there is no danger of Great Britain turning her Navy over to Germany as France did, for instance. I am not afraid of that emergency arising, although I have to say, when the question is asked, that it is possible. All things are possible. It may be, Mr. President, that before we return here tomorrow an earthquate will have destroyed the Capitol, but I do not believe such an event will happen. We hope it will not happen. It probably will not happen. I do not expect to see Hitler get the English Navy. I am not afraid of that, although it is possible that it may occur.

Mr. LEE. Since it is possible, then does not the Senator think we ought to give ourselves the benefit of the doubt?

Mr. NORRIS. Everything is possible. Let us suppose that a part of our Navy is in the Pacific and a part of it is in the Atlantic, and we want to bring that part which is in one ocean through the Panama Canal and into the other ocean. It is possible that an earthquake may destroy the Panama Canal when our ships are going through. It is possible that a hurricane on the Pacific Ocean may destroy our fleet in that ocean, and another hurricane in the Atlantic Ocean may destroy our Atlantic Fleet. Such things are possibilities. They are in the hands of God. When I see how success has come to some of the dictators it seems to me that God is on the other side. It does not seem to me that He is on the right side in this fight. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I shall vote for the joint resolution, although I do not believe it ought to carry the authority to take the men anywhere in the Western Hemisphere. Congress can be called together if such an emergency should arise. Many persons seem afraid that it might arise with lightning speed. I do not think it will. I think if we keep our feet on the ground, stop talking, and go home we can accomplish more good for peace and prosperity than in any other way.

The Senate is a hotbed of hysteria. The Senate is where the country will obtain its ammunition to become worked up and hysterical if it becomes hysterical. To my mind, there is no danger that we shall be confronted with an invading army in the next 30 days. If there is such danger, God help us! The law which we propose to pass would not do any good. More than 30 days would be required to work it out. So we should be helpless if such a thing should happen. It is possible if all the world comes over here in flying machines. It is possible that Hitler may have hidden away 50,000 more planes which he has never exposed, and that he will get them all out next week and come over here with them. I do not believe it. I believe most of them would be lost in the attempt. We must give him credit for having some wisdom, even though he is a butcher and a murderer.

Mr. President, I shall vote for the joint resolution. It will perform a very useful service for those who believe we ought to commence training tomorrow. It will give us a standing Army, or the equivalent of a standing Army, of 700,000 or 800,000 men; and with our Navy as it stands today, and with our power in the air as it exists today, I do not believe a combination of all 4 of the dictator nations—if they should combine within the next 30 days—could overcome us with the disadvantages they would have to confront.

I do not think the situation is so dangerous; but if it is, the joint resolution will help to meet the danger. I hope and pray that reason may come back again to us and to our fellow citizens, and that when we do this much, people will say that we have done our duty. We shall have gone even beyond reason in getting ready; and I hope we shall defeat the bill which is to follow, known as the compulsory military training bill, which, in my opinion, is more dangerous to our peace and tranquility than anything else which has yet been undertaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I ask that the committee amendment, as amended, be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment, as amended, will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 5, after the words "a period of", it is proposed to strike out "not to exceed 1 year" and insert in lieu thereof "12 consecutive months each."

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ADAMS. Would it be within the parliamentary privilege to amend the amendment so as to include certain words which were originally in the joint resolution? The words "not to exceed one year" are proposed to be stricken out. I should like, if possible, to have the amendment divided, if necessary, so that the words "one year" could be stricken out, leaving the words "not to exceed."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, from a parliamentary standpoint the committee amendment, as amended, is offered as a substitute for the language which is stricken out; and the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended in lieu of the language stricken out. If the amendment as amended is defeated, the original language of the joint resolution will be restored.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Disagreeing to the committee amendment, as amended, would restore the original language.

Mr. ADAMS. I trust that the committee amendment, as amended, will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I should like to ask my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] a question. Is it intended by this language to require the President to call out the National Guard for as long as a year?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is what the National Guard specifically requested.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know that is what they requested.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is the intention.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have not concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. May I answer on the point as to how the amendment happened to be written the way it is?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The War Department did not want the Reserve officers and the Reserve components, including the National Guard, called out for a period longer than 1 year; and the Reserve officers and the National Guard, if they were to be called out, did not want to be called out for less than one year.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Both sides were represented before our committee. We compromised the matter between them, and made the period exactly 1 year.

Mr. CONNALLY. The language is not quite clear to a layman. I am not a military man, but the language "for a period of 12 consecutive months"——

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The purpose was to avoid going back home and then returning again to the service.

Mr. CONNALLY. It seems to me quite probable that the President would prefer not to call them all at once. He might want to call one group this month, another group next month, and still another group the following month.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. He has that right.

Mr. CONNALLY. The language should be so framed that the President may call them, but that when he does call them he must give them a year's pay.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. That is exactly what the joint resolution provides for.

Mr. CONNALLY. The members of the National Guard did not want to give up their jobs unless they could have a year's continuous service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. That is what the joint resolution provides for.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I call attention to the language following the committee amendment. The President is authorized to call "any or all members and units," and so forth.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. So he does not have to call them all at once.

Mr. CONNALLY. That provision does not refer to the time. I assume, under that language, that he could call them. The trouble with the Army now is that it cannot digest all the influx at one time.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment to the amendment has already been agreed to, so he may call them from time to time.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. I know that my able colleague is looking after all the details.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will yield in a moment. I wish to pay deserved tribute to my colleague, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], who worked on this measure unremittingly and laboriously, and brought to it very fine ability and industry. I wish publicly to pay tribute to him for that work.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am very grateful to my colleague.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I concur in what the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has to say about his colleague. He has been very patient all through the long-drawn-out hearings.

Mr. CONNALLY. If he had not been patient he would not have had any bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. That is exactly correct.

In regard to the compromise which I mentioned a moment ago, which the committee made between the Army and the National Guard, the representatives of the Army were present before the committee, and approved the period of 1 year. They said they had no objections to it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am very glad to know that the National Guard and the Army are in agreement for once.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry of my colleague, the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON].

To what extent does the Senator know that those who appeared before the committee represented the sentiment of the National Guard in saying that if they were called they wanted to be called for a full year? I know some members of the National Guard who wish the period to be as short as possible if they must be called.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I do not suppose the officers of any organization represent all of its membership; but all the National Guard members from whom I have heard want to be called for a year if they are to be called. They do not want to be called for a month or two. They want to make their plans to go into the Army and take a year's training. The joint resolution has the approval of the members of the National Guard.

Mr. ADAMS. That is one interpretation; but as the joint resolution stands it would authorize the National Guard to be put into the service of the United States and sent to South America, the Philippines, or anywhere else. It is something more than a training measure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Yes; it is something more than a training measure; but the National Guard officers from whom we have heard are in accord. General Reckord, from Maryland, appeared before the committee and said that the National Guard was unanimous in wanting to be called out for a year. I have heard from many of the Reserve officers, and I know they want to be called out for a year.

Mr. ADAMS. If that be the case, the President would naturally conform to their wishes; so even if we left in the words "not to exceed" their wishes could be complied with, while if there are units in the National Guard which do not want to be called for a full year they would be compelled to go for a full year in spite of their wishes. It seems to me that if we leave the original language in the joint resolution we can protect both groups.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The testimony of the National Guard representatives was the other way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

On a division, the committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next committee amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, it is obvious that we probably cannot conclude the consideration of the joint resolution tonight. I have told a number of Members that if we could not do so we would suspend about 5 o'clock. It is now that hour.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee in charge of the joint resolution with reference to an amendment which the Governor of my State had proposed to the Committee on Military Affairs with reference to authorizing the States to maintain troops whenever the National Guard, by order of the Federal Government, is called out.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have advised the Governor of New York that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs desires to cover that matter in a separate bill. We are going to take it up next Friday.

Mr. WAGNER. At any rate, I prepared in response to his communication an amendment which I ask to have printed. I ask the chairman of the committee to look at it overnight, and perhaps we can reach some agreement about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs I report favorably sundry Army nominations which were received by the Senate on the 1st day of August. These nominations are entirely of routine character, and total several hundred in number; and because of the large amount of printing involved I ask unanimous consent for their present consideration and confirmation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations are confirmed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be at once advised of the confirmation of these nominations, and that the list of names of the persons confirmed be not again printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but that proper reference be made to the pages on which their nominations appear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified, and the further request of the Senator from Texas will be complied with.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Fay L. Bentley to be judge of the Juvenile Court for the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Walter A. Foote to be consul general.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of George P. Baker to be a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board for the remainder of the term expiring December 31, 1943.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the United States Public Health Service.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Public Health Service be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Mervin Gilbert McConnel to be brigadier general, National Guard of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That concludes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, August 6, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, AUGUST 5, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. John Knox Bowling, D. D., minister of the First Presbyterian Church, Duncan, Okla., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, it is with grateful hearts that we turn in the beginning of this new day and this new week to ask Thy blessings upon our efforts of the day and of the week. We are privileged to thank Thee for every blessing with which Thou hast endowed each of our lives and our experiences. We pray Thee that we may worthily accept the responsibilities incumbent upon us, and as our duties are performed give us a gathering definite consciousness of duty well done. We pray Thy blessing upon the Nation of which we are a part, and that Thou will give to each of us who are charged with the responsibility of leadership a desire and an earnest satisfaction in fulfilling that desire of making our Nation the one which shall lead this chaotic world into a new sense of orderliness again. Let Thy blessing rest upon the officers and the Members of the House this day, this week, and this session. In Jesus' name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, August 1, 1940, was read and approved.

INAUGURATION OF THE PRESIDENT-ELECT IN JANUARY 1941

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following joint resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 467

Resolved, etc., That all amounts paid for admission tickets sold by authority of the Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies of the inauguration of the President-elect in January 1941, said committee to be appointed with the approval of the President-elect, shall be exempt from the tax on admissions imposed by section 500 of the Revenue Act of 1926, as amended, all the net proceeds from the sale of said tickets to be donated by the said committee to charity.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do not see the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] here. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts know that the joint resolution is being taken up at this time?

Mr. DOUGHTON. This is a customary resolution passed each 4 years. It has a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That is a matter we take care of every other Congress?

Mr. DOUGHTON. It is the same matter we have taken care of before, and it comes with a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I believe there is no objection, Mr. Speaker, so I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein two brief newspaper articles.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia.

There was no objection.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an address by Wright Morrow, my long-time friend, nominating JOHN NANCE GARNER for President on the Democratic ticket at the national convention in Chicago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHINS asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a statement made by my colleague, Hon. CLYDE WILLIAMS, of the Eighth District of Missouri, which was published in the Missouri Democrat under date of August 2.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, when the vote was taken last Thursday on the bill (S. 3998) to increase the credit resources of the Commodity Credit Corporation, I was unable to be present, because I was attending to important official duties. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea" on the final passage of the bill.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on today, after the completion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter from a constituent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

REFUGEE CHILDREN

Mr. COLMER, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution, which was read, referred to the House Calendar, and ordered printed:

House Resolution 562

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 10213, a bill to permit American vessels to assist in the evacuation from the war zones of certain refugee children. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a resolution passed in one of the counties of my district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, when the so-called draft bill was introduced by Senator BURKE, which is known as the Burke-Wadsworth bill, the country was falsely led to believe that that was an administration or Roosevelt bill. Personally, I want to assure the Members of the House and the country that that was not an administration bill, because I know the President would not call upon Senator BURKE or the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who have been and are viciously opposed to him, and request that they introduce legislation in behalf of the administration.

I am satisfied, and I am sure every intelligent man knows, that the introduction of the bill providing for the drafting of boys of 18 and grandfathers of 65 is nothing but a Republican scheme to smear the President and the administration. The President is for a draft if it becomes necessary, but not for such a ridiculous plan as set forth in the Burke-Wadsworth bill.

The President's position on this matter has been made very clear. He favors a draft only if sufficient men cannot be obtained for the Army and Navy through voluntary enlistment, and he has pointed out that those who do enlist will primarily be trained in vocational studies. But you will recall that he plainly stated that, regardless of his own feelings, he was leaving the matter entirely up to Congress.

That is all I wanted to make clear, Mr. Speaker. I believe the public should know that this bill was not prepared by the administration, and it should also know that Congress will be the body to decide upon just what type of legislation will be enacted.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two short editorials from a local weekly paper in my district, together with a letter and a telegram that I sent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, I make the further request that I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the Chicago Daily Times entitled "Roosevelt and Wallace."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on three subjects.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address on the Oregon Pioneer by W. L. Gosslin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech by Daniel Webster against conscription.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article from a Pacific coast newspaper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an open letter addressed to me from the Utica (Ohio) Herald.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the Daily Times, of Beaver, Pa.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

CODIFICATION OF THE NATIONALITY LAWS

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have asked unanimous consent at this time to call the attention of the Members of the House to what is known as the proposed Nationality Act of 1940. It is H. R. 9980, and the committee report is House Report 2396. The original bill was introduced early in the spring and the revised measure introduced June 3, 1940. Extensive hearings were held on the bill by a subcommittee of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. Representatives of the State Department, Immigration and Naturalization Service, and the Department of Justice as well as the War Department, appeared and gave testimony on the bill. The American Bar Association and some other groups were represented at the hearings. The bill has the approval of the various departments of the Government. The American Bar Association, through its representatives, also approves the measure. It has been recommended by the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization without objection. A rule has been granted and the bill is on the House Calendar.

I particularly want to call your attention to the importance of this measure and urge you to give it your careful study and consideration—so when it comes to the floor of the House for debate, there will be no feeling on the part of this membership that the bill has not heretofore been brought to your attention. The purpose of the Nationality Code is to bring together in orderly and systematic form a consolidation of the laws of the United States upon citizenship, nationality, and expatriation. The bill also amends the present law with a view of making it more workable and to strengthen it and make it more enforceable. The bill also provides for repealing obsolete, conflicting, and unnecessary portions of the law, and would permit more prompt and expeditious enforcement of our nationality law.

I suggest that the membership of the House examine the bill and especially the report, so that you may be more familiar with this measure, as well as the problem involved, when it comes to the floor of the House for consideration. Let me suggest, too, that this measure is in no wise political and should in my opinion have the support of the membership of Congress. This proposal, in my opinion, is of great importance. I trust the membership of the House will give approval to the bill when it comes up for consideration.

WILL THE 1940 ELECTION BE ANOTHER PUBLIC AUCTION

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am in possession of information showing a startling increase in the orders for the printing of blank relief checks and food stamps by the Bureau of Printing and Engraving during the past week or so, and I have requested this privilege of the floor to bring the matter to the attention of the Congress.

My information is that orders for 10,000,000 blank relief checks have been received by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in the past 10 days—more blank relief checks than have been printed by the Bureau in the past 9 months. I am told that approximately 3,000,000 of these checks have been ordered for use in Minnesota, whose Governor is the Honorable Harold E. Stassen. Other blank checks have been ordered for use in New York, Illinois, and other politically key States.

I have also information to the effect that more food stamps were shipped out by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in 3 days recently than have been shipped out in the entire history of the food-stamp plan. The supply has gone to Brooklyn, Minneapolis, Cleveland, and other politically strategic centers.

I am fully aware of the serious nature of the implications contained in these developments, and if the past performance of the administration had not been what it had been, I would hesitate to make public these facts and bring them to the floor of the House of Representatives. We must remember, however, that, despite the fact that Harry Hopkins, then the Administrator of the W. P. A., in an address delivered on May 8, 1938, said:

> Anyone who uses his position with the W. P. A. in any way to influence the votes of others by threat or intimidation would be dismissed.

Nevertheless, the President's chief relief officials have made many political statements designed to influence relief votes.

Aubrey Williams, then Deputy Administrator of W. P. A., now head of the National Youth Administration, in a speech to the Workers Alliance, Washington, D. C., June 27, 1938, said:

> You know your friends very well. Just judge the folks who come and ask for your support by the crowd they run with. * * * The people who stand for Government support of work-relief measures are those who are going to win the election.

Incidentally I find that, in addition to the 10,000,000 relief checks, 700,000 of new checks have been ordered by N. Y. A. to be administered by Mr. Williams.

Harry Hopkins, then Administrator of the W. P. A., now Secretary of Commerce, and one of the directing heads of the New Deal campaign, said, in a press conference on July 21, 1938:

> We got about 3,000,000 people working for us, and they are Americans like ourselves, and no one can tell them how to vote. * * * They have their own political views, and incidentally I think I know what their views are. * * * At least 90 percent of them are for Roosevelt.

Keeping in mind this sudden and significant, not to say startling, increase in the orders for blank checks, it becomes a remarkable coincidence that the number of persons on the Federal relief rolls have in the past increased greatly from June through October in each election year. Thus, in 1933, a nonelection year, the number of persons on Federal relief declined 15.4 percent during these months, although the index of industrial production, reflecting employment, declined 16.5 percent in that period; yet in the election year of 1934 the number of persons on Federal relief increased 11.6 percent from June through October.

In 1935, a nonelection year, the Federal relief rolls showed a decline of 9.6 percent from June through October; but in 1936, an election year, the Federal relief rolls increased 14.4 percent, although unemployment had been reduced 13 percent. In 1937, when there was no election, the Federal relief rolls showed a decline of 16.9 percent from June through October, although the index of production declined 10.5 percent in that period. But in 1938, an election year, the Federal relief rolls showed an increase of 19.2 percent, although unemployment declined 9 percent from June through October. In 1939, when there was no election, the number on relief declined 25.5 percent for the months preceding the usual election date.

The Senate Committee to Investigate Campaign Expenditures and the use of Government funds in the campaign of 1938, composed of one Republican and four Democratic Senators, under the chairmanship of Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas, reported that all over the country pressure was brought to bear on relief workers, relief funds were wrongfully used for political purposes, and the committee found that especially deplorable conditions existed in Kentucky.

The able senior Senator from Virginia, the Honorable CARTER GLASS, declared in another in another body of the Congress June 24, 1937, page 6284 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that—

> The last election was carried by people who were getting favors from the Government, people who were subsidized by the Government, people who were on relief rolls, and people who sanctioned the invasion of private property and its occupation, as is being done now. We have got no government in Washington and we have got no government in some of the States, because government has surrendered to mob violence.

Under the circumstances and in view of this record in the past, this startling and sudden increase in the number of relief checks has a significance which cannot be ignored. Ten million blank relief checks will, whether or not it is so intended, reach and perhaps influence a lot of voters. The free gift of food by the use of food stamps, the distribution of which is under the authority of Henry A. Wallace, the New Deal Vice Presidential candidate, will reach a lot of voters who naturally would be expected to feel friendly to the administration which gave them this food.

This certainly is a situation in which the old adage has a direct application: "Where there is so much smoke there's bound to be some fire."

Mr. Speaker, I am in possession of information which shows that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is now at work printing around 10,000,000 blank relief checks; and also that in 3 days during the past week the Bureau of Engraving and Printing shipped out more food stamps than have been used in all the history of the food-stamp plan.

I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, whether the election in 1940 will be just another public auction.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Is the gentleman opposed to the food-stamp plan in any State?

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. I am not opposed to decent regulation of the food-stamp plan; no.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman intimate that the administration of the food-stamp plan has not been decent and that it has not been one of the greatest programs put over by this administration?

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. I can assure the gentleman from Oklahoma that I am perfectly cognizant of the serious implications made in my few remarks this morning.

AMENDMENT OF THE TARIFF ACT OF 1930

Mr. McCORMACK, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill (H. R. 10181) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended by section 34 (c) of the Customs Administrative Act of 1938 (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. IV, title 19, sec. 1001, par. 1529 (a)), which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

JUDGE MARVIN JONES

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and in connection with my remarks to extend a certain resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I have asked this time to call to the attention of the Members of the House the fact that on last Thursday morning, August 1, 1940, the members of the Agricultural Committee met in an informal meeting for the purpose of delivering to our colleague the gentleman from Texas, MARVIN JONES, the distinguished chairman of the House Agricultural Committee, an appropriate resolution endorsing his long and distinguished service in the Congress of the United States.

This resolution was drafted by a special committee composed of members of the Agricultural Committee, after which it was transcribed on parchment and placed in an appropriate frame for presentation.

This resolution sets forth the date of his election, his outstanding service as a Member of Congress during the past 24 years, and his 10 years of service as chairman of the Agricultural Committee.

The resolution also commends President Roosevelt for his wise selection and appointment of the gentleman from Texas, MARVIN JONES, to the judicial branch of the Federal Government. As you know, the President has given Marvin an appointment as judge with the Court of Claims, and his appointment has been confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Members of the House will be interested in reading this resolution as adopted by the committee, and I am requesting the privilege of including same as a part of my remarks.

Resolutions adopted by the Committee on Agriculture of the United States House of Representatives, May 21, 1940

Whereas the President of the United States has named the Honorable MARVIN JONES and the Senate of the United States has confirmed his appointment as judge on the United States Court of Claims; and

Whereas MARVIN JONES elected as Representative to the United States House of Representatives in 1917 from Texas, where he attained high recognition for his mental and legal talents; and

Whereas in 1920 he became a member of the Committee on Agriculture of the United States House of Representatives, and in December of 1931 became chairman of said committee; and

Whereas as chairman of said committee he has demonstrated outstanding and unusual mental and human qualities; and

Whereas because of his fine understanding of the problems of agriculture, his untiring application, his legal and legislative ability, his tolerance, impartiality, and his fairness and leadership, this committee has made an outstanding record in presentation and passage of major bills and legislation through the House of Representatives and Senate and its service to agriculture and the Nation; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Committee on Agriculture of the United States House of Representatives, having served with MARVIN JONES as a member and as chairman of this committee, experience a real and sincere sense of regret and loss in his retirement from Congress and as chairman of this committee; and be it further

Resolved, That in our service with him we have developed a high and continuing regard for his ability, his leadership, his fairness, and for all of those qualities which are inherent in a real man and a true friend; and we are

Resolved, That we commend the President of the United States for his selection of Mr. JONES to the judicial branch of our Government with united acclaim and our expressed conviction that Mr. JONES is preeminently qualified to fill this post or a vacancy on the Supreme Court of the United States; and we are finally

Resolved, That these resolutions be presented to him in token of our individual and unanimous affection, esteem, and regard for him as our friend and colleague and that as Members of Congress charged with the responsibility in the House of Representatives with considering legislation affecting agriculture, the basic industry of our country, that we commend Mr. JONES for his invaluable service to agriculture and to the Nation as a Representative in the Congress of the United States of America.

In these, our resolutions, we express the earnest, individual, and united wish that in the new task which our friend is assuming that his efforts may be blessed with continuing high success in the service of his country and that he may be blessed with good health and happiness.

To these we put our hands.

H. P. Fulmer, Wall Doxey, John W. Flannagan, Jr., Harry P. Beam, J. G. Polk, R. M. Kleberg, Fred Cummings, Walter M. Pierce, Aug. H. Andresen, Frank E. Hook, Harry B. Coffee, Orville Zimmerman, Harold D. Cooley, Stephen Pace, Clifford R. Hope, J. Roland Kinzer, Fred C. Gilchrist, Phil Ferguson, Wm. Lemke, Ralph O. Brewster, Anton J. Johnson, Reid F. Murray, Frank O. Horton, Cliff Clevenger, Samuel Wilder King, Bolivar Pagan.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include a quotation from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in a unanimous-consent request which has already been granted to me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Also, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include a short article from the New York Tribune.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I do so in order to read the following statement sent out by the Associated Press:

LEGION CHIEF FOR "VOLUNTEER" ARMY

INDIANAPOLIS, August 1, 1940.—Raymond J. Kelly, national commander of the American Legion, said in an interview today he favors conscription only as a last resort, and then an all-inclusive conscription.

"We are not at war," he said, "although everything that is being done seems to be based on the theory that we are, or that we will be any moment."

In place of conscription, the Legion commander proposed a call for a million volunteers for a year's training.

"I believe the response," he said, "would be tremendous." And he pointed out it took only a few days to get 50,000 student pilots for so-called Plattsburgs of the air.

In event of war, Kelly said, business and industry, as well as men, should be drafted, and "all elements of the Nation should serve equally."

Kelly deplored propaganda he said is being spread in an effort to get the United States to send troops to the European war.

I approve and endorse the statement of Commander Kelly, which is similar to the recommendations of former Secretary of War Harry Woodring, and believe it is based on sound common sense and reason, and reflects the views of a large majority of the House of Representatives and the American people.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow, Tuesday, after the conclusion of the business of the House, I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include a radio address delivered by me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the special order tomorrow just granted to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] I be permitted to address the House for 25 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I have two unanimous-consent requests, one to extend my remarks and to include therein a speech I delivered on foreign trade, and also to extend my remarks upon the expenditures of the Federal Government in Butler County, Kans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a discussion on the Monroe Doctrine by Mr. Castle, from the Saturday Evening Post, and also to extend my remarks and to include a radio address I delivered myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix of the RECORD a resolution adopted by the American Legion, Department of South Dakota, at its annual convention.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on two subjects and to include a newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is consent day, and the Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

TIDAL POWER, PASSAMAQUODDY BAY

The Clerk called Senate Joint Resolution 57, authorizing the Secretary of War to cause a completion of surveys, test borings, and foundation investigations to be made to determine the advisability and cost of putting in a small experimental plant for development of tidal power in the waters in and about Passamaquoddy Bay, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for such examinations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PARTICIPATION OF STATES IN CERTAIN REVENUES FROM NATIONAL PARKS, ETC.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9535, to authorize the participation of States in certain revenues from national parks, national monuments, and other areas under the administrative jurisdiction of the National Park Service, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. RICH, Mr. SPRINGER, and Mr. TABER objected to the consideration of the bill, and the same was stricken from the calendar.

MACKINAC STRAITS BRIDGE

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1379, granting the consent of Congress to the Mackinac Straits Bridge Authority to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge or series of bridges, causeways, and approaches thereto, across the Straits of Mackinac at or near a point between St. Ignace, Mich., and the Lower Peninsula of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. Speaker, this bill was originally introduced by Senator BROWN when he first came to Congress, and it has been pushed around and objected to here ever since.

The bill requires no money and asks for no money. It merely asks permission to allow the State of Michigan to build a bridge across the Straits of Mackinac. My colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO], who objects, comes from one of the most progressive districts in Michigan. This bill would be of great service to the people of his district.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is to have permission to address the House, then I ask equal time to address the House on the same subject.

Mr. RABAUT. I have no objection to the gentleman's addressing the House, but I would like to see if it would not be possible to have this bill passed by this House today. Here is a great necessity, that of crossing the Straits of Mackinac, the necessity for a bridge; and the Highway Department of Michigan are very anxious to have legislation introduced in the State Legislature of Michigan for the purpose of having the State itself pay for this bridge. We ask nothing from the Federal Government except the right from the War Department to consider the construction of a bridge across navigable waters.

On what grounds does the gentleman object?

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, my views are well stated——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not reserving the right to object to his own request, is he?

Mr. DONDERO. I have asked unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice, but I object to its present consideration under the Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I sincerely hope that we may be given an opportunity to discuss this bill later in the day.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RABAUT. How could this bill be brought up later in the day if it is passed over without prejudice now?

The SPEAKER. It cannot be brought up again today on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. RABAUT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman what is his request.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Can the bill be brought up under a request for suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. It could be brought up under a suspension of the rules if the Speaker recognized a Member for that purpose, which the Speaker has no intention of doing.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I object to the request to pass the bill over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

SIOUX INDIAN MASSACRE AT WOUNDED KNEE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 953, to liquidate the liability of the United States for the massacre of Sioux Indian men, women, and children at Wounded Knee on December 29, 1890.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO, Mr. HOFFMAN, and Mr. RICH objected.

SMITHSONIAN GALLERY OF ART

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9806, to permit the Smithsonian Gallery of Art Commission to purchase a model of the winning design for the proposed Smithsonian Gallery of Art, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TABER, Mr. SPRINGER, and Mr. RICH objected.

ORIENTAL-LANGUAGE INTERPRETERS—IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8181, to grant retirement benefits to Chinese, Japanese, and Hindu interpreters in the United States Immigration and Naturalization Service.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 3 of the Civil Service Retirement Act, as amended, is amended by inserting after subdivision (g) thereof the following new subdivision:

"(h) Chinese, Japanese, and Hindu interpreters in the United States Immigration and Naturalization Service, whose tenure of employment is not intermittent nor of uncertain duration."

With the following committee amendments:

In line 5 strike out "(g)" and insert "(i)."

In line 6 strike out "(h)" and insert "(j)."

In line 7, after the word "Service", insert a comma and add the following: "who are citizens of the United States and."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR—CIVIL SERVICE LAWS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9041, to provide that assistant or deputy heads of certain bureaus in the Department of the Interior shall be appointed under the civil-service laws, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter assistant or deputy commissioners of the Bureau of Fisheries, General Land Office, and Bureau of Indian Affairs, in the Department of the Interior, shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, subject to the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. Appointments to these positions shall be considered as made under the authority of section 169 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (5 U. S. C., sec. 43). Assistant and deputy commissioners so appointed shall be authorized to sign such letters, papers, and documents and to perform such other duties as may be directed by the commissioner of their respective bureaus. The Secretary may designate for each of the afore-mentioned bureaus an assistant or deputy commissioner, who shall be authorized to perform the duties of the commissioner in case of the death, resignation, absence or sickness of the commissioner.

SEC. 2. All provisions of law inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed to the extent of such inconsistency.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "Bureau of Fisheries."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CREATING A MOUNTAIN DISTRICT IN THE STATE OF TENNESSEE

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1681, an act to amend section 107 of the Judicial Code to create a mountain district in the State of Tennessee, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. A rule has been granted for the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH]?

There was no objection.

CESSION BY THE STATE OF WASHINGTON OF JURISDICTION OVER CERTAIN LANDS IN OLYMPIC NATIONAL PARK

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6559, to accept the cession by the State of Washington of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Olympic National Park, and for other purposes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT]?

There was no objection.

TORT CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7236, to provide for the adjustment of certain claims against the United States and to confer jurisdiction in respect thereto on the Court of Claims and the district courts of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this is quite a long, complicated bill. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SMITH]?

There was no objection.

FRED B. WOODWARD

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9432, to limit the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code, and section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States with respect to certain counsel.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN OIL- AND GAS-PROSPECTING PERMITS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8448, to provide for the extension of certain oil- and gas-prospecting permits.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of any other act, any oil- or gas-prospecting permit issued under authority of the act entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain," approved February 25, 1920, as amended, which expired between December 31, 1937, and January 1, 1940, because of lack of authority under existing laws to make extension of such permits, shall, upon application to the Secretary of the Interior and subject to valid intervening rights, be extended for an additional period ending December 31, 1941.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN FORMER DISBURSING OFFICERS FOR THE CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION AND FEDERAL EMERGENCY RELIEF ADMINISTRATION

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9514, for the relief of certain former disbursing officers for the Civil Works Administration and the Federal Emergency Relief Administration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the author of the bill to explain it a little more fully than is given in the report?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the chairman of the committee is present, but the purpose of the bill is to clean up the accounts of the Civil Works Administration and the Federal Relief Administration, both of these agencies being now defunct. There are no employees on the Federal pay roll for either of those two agencies of the Government.

The purpose of the bill is simply to allow for the correction of the accounts of the employees. A bill was previously introduced specifying the names of the persons and the amount of money to be allowed for errors in their accounts. That bill went through to the President for approval, but it happened that during the interval between the time of the introduction of the legislation and the time the bill was received by the President there had been certain corrections in the amounts and as a result the bill specified balances that were not accurate. For this reason the President vetoed the bill.

Mr. RICH. What amount do they want to charge off these records?

Mr. COSTELLO. I may say to the gentleman that I do not know what the exact amounts are as to each individual case.

Mr. RICH. Were these paymasters bonded?

Mr. COSTELLO. I think so. These are only small items, possibly $5,000 or a little over that in any one case. I think the committee report here shows at the bottom of page 2 and at the top of page 3 the amounts.

Mr. RICH. Were these paymasters bonded?

Mr. COSTELLO. I believe they were.

Mr. RICH. If they were bonded, why do we have to except them by law and pass a special piece of legislation for their exemption?

Mr. COSTELLO. These are largely due to errors that have taken place in the entry of accounts, very often by inferior persons, and they are charged up to the man in charge of the department, the head paymaster. A similar procedure has been followed here that has been followed by the War and Navy Departments, and by other agencies of the Government.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman remembers that we charged off some $80,000,000 a year or so ago on accounts where the paymasters were bonded and because of their negligence the taxpayers of the country had to suffer. Is the gentleman sure that the amount of this charge-off is only about $5,000?

Mr. COSTELLO. I am reading from the report at the bottom of page 2 here, next to the last paragraph, "approximately $5,472.39 cover exceptions," and so forth. It is not only $5,000. There are different items. There is, on page 2, an item of $5,000; there is another one for $5,400, and another one for $2,900. The report on page 3 shows the remaining items that are to be charged off. I am not a member of the Committee on Claims which reported the bill. When the bill was called previously I asked unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice because I thought it was not in the usual form in that it did not specify the names of the persons.

Mr. RICH. Has the gentleman made a personal study of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. I had a man from that agency come down and talk to me and explain the reason for the different procedure, and it was because of the fact this is an agency of the Government that has been terminated and has ceased to exist. This simply gives authority to clean up the accounts.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman will look on page 3, I notice not less than four or five different items that they want to charge off, not one particular item. There is one for $5,472.39, another for $2,962.73, another for $1,307.28, another for $13,631.05, another for $12,406.44, and another exception for $6,355.58.

Does the gentleman feel that this is a wise piece of legislation to pass at this particular time?

Mr. COSTELLO. I may say to the gentleman that most of these items are exceptions that have been made by the General Accounting Office over the method of handling these accounts. Take, for example, the item there of $13,000, to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman believe the new Comptroller General, Lindsay Warren, would recommend that these accounts be charged off?

Mr. COSTELLO. I believe that he most probably would. If the gentleman will read the explanation there of that $13,000 item, he will find that the payments were made for purposes other than indicated in the accounts, although the Federal Government received the full benefit of the services. The payment shown as personal services should have been shown as rental of equipment, so it is merely a technicality that has been raised about this $13,000 item. I believe the gentleman will find that the same is true for each of the different items listed there.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman from California has made a study of it, and since we have a lot of respect for his judgment, I shall not object.

Mr. COSTELLO. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

PERSONS CONVICTED OF A FEDERAL OFFENSE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9954, to amend section 7 of the act of May 14, 1930 (46 Stat. 326; U. S. C., title 18, sec. 753f), relating to places of confinement and transfers of persons convicted of an offense against the United States.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PERMITTING WIRE TAPPING IN CERTAIN CASES

The Clerk called the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 571) to authorize the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice to conduct investigations in the interest of national defense, and for that purpose to permit wire tapping in certain cases.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I object, Mr. Speaker.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF NORTH CAROLINA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9122, to provide a mixed civil and criminal term of 2 weeks at Raleigh of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of North Carolina.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the third paragraph of section 98 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. V, title 28, sec. 179), is amended to read as follows:

"The terms of the District Court for the Eastern District of North Carolina shall be held at Raleigh, a 1-week civil term, on the second Mondays in September and March, and at the following places on each succeeding Monday thereafter: Fayetteville, Elizabeth City, Washington, New Bern, Wilson, Wilmington, and Raleigh, the term at Raleigh being a mixed criminal and civil term of 2 weeks, civil business to be called at the conclusion of the criminal. The clerk of the court for the eastern district shall maintain an office in charge of himself or deputy at Raleigh, at Wilmington, at New Bern, at Elizabeth City, at Washington, at Fayetteville, and at Wilson which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GEN. ANDREW PICKENS

The Clerk called the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 369) to provide for the erection of a shrine or monument to the memory of Gen. Andrew Pickens.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF NATIONAL PARK SCENERY

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 769, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to furnish mats for the reproduction in magazines and newspapers of photographs of national park scenery.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his request for a moment?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this bill has already passed the Senate. It carries an appropriation of only $3,000. Its purpose is, of course, to stimulate travel as much as possible in the great scenic parks like Yellowstone National Park, Glacier Park, and all of the others by permitting small country newspapers to have the advantage of having mats of photographs and maps, and so forth, showing the scenic places in the various parks, for publication in these small papers. At the present time the cost is prohibitive. As this bill carries only a small appropriation and will do a lot to get before the public as a whole these scenic places in the manner I have indicated, I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his request.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOLLES. Does the gentleman believe the newspapers will print these maps?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is my information.

Mr. BOLLES. I do not believe they will, and I am a newspaperman. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, my request was that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

DIVISION OF INVESTIGATIONS, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2627, to empower and authorize special agents and such other employees of the Division of Investigations, Department of the Interior, as are designated by the Secretary of the Interior for that purpose, to administer oaths in the performance of their official duties.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TABER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is anyone here in charge of this bill? If not, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

KELLEY HOMESTEAD, NEAR ELK RIVER, MINN.

The Clerk called the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 376) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to accept from the National Grange a lease of the Kelley Homestead, near Elk River, Minn., and providing for its development and maintenance.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

EXCEPTIONS TO SECTION 3709 OF THE REVISED STATUTES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 10061, to consolidate certain exceptions to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes and to improve the United States Code.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the purpose of this bill, and I would like to have the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] explain its provisions.

Mr. COCHRAN. I may say to the gentleman from Montana that this bill was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEOGH]. The purpose of the bill is to place in the United States Code under one heading all the exemptions that have been granted to section 3709.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. KEOGH] has some clarifying amendments to offer. This bill will not disturb existing law in any way, but simply places in the United States Code, under one head, all of the exemptions without requiring one who is interested to go through the entire code to locate four or five dozen exemptions. There are one or two errors in the bill which I have called to the attention of the gentleman from New York, and he has certain amendments to correct them, because I do not want in this manner to disturb the existing situation.

Further I will say if the Senate adds any additional exemptions to this bill as chairman of the committee that reported it I will not agree to the action of the Senate.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will say to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that I shall withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3709 of the Revised Statutes shall not be construed to apply to any purchases or services authorized by any appropriation act for the hereinafter enumerated independent offices and departments—

(a) Where the aggregate amount involved does not exceed the sum of $25—

(1) The Civil Service Commission.
(2) The Department of Commerce.
(3) The Department of Justice.
(4) The District of Columbia.

(7) The Rural Electrification Administration.
(8) The Smithsonian Institution.
(9) The United States Maritime Commission.

(d) Where the aggregate amount involved does not exceed the sum of $500—

(1) The Bureau of Mines.
(2) The United States Section of International Boundaries Commission, United States and Mexico.

SEC. 2. Section 3709 of the Revised Statutes shall not be construed to apply under any appropriation act to the following independent offices and departments under the circumstances specified herein:

(a) American Battle Monuments Commission—to any purchases when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed $500, nor to any leases in foreign countries for office or garage space.

(b) Bureau of the Budget—to any purchases of office equipment and supplies when the amount involved in any case does not exceed $50.

(c) The Bureau of Interparliamentary Union for Promotion of International Arbitration—to stenographic reporting services by contract if deemed necessary.

(d) Department of State—to any purchase or service when the aggregate amount does not exceed $100, or with respect to articles, materials, or supplies for use outside the United States when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed $300; or when the purchase or service relates to the packing of personal and household effects of Diplomatic, Consular, and Foreign Service officers and clerks for foreign shipment.

(e) Federal Communications Commission—to any purchase or exchange of instruments when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed $25.

(f) The International Committee of Aerial Legal Experts—to stenographic and other service by contract as deemed necessary.

(g) Medical Department of the Army—to the purchase of medicines and medical supplies.

(h) Social Security Board—to any purchase when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed $100.

SEC. 3. Materials and equipment for the control of incipient or emergency outbreaks of insects, pests, or grass diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs, may be procured with any sums appropriated to carry out the provisions of Public Resolution No. 91, approved May 9, 1928, without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, and the transportation thereof may be under such conditions and means as shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture to be most advantageous.

SEC. 4. The sections or parts of sections of the Statutes at Large heretofore covering the provisions consolidated in this Act are repealed insofar as they are incorporated in the United States Code, 1934 Edition and Supplements thereto, as shown by the appended table: Provided, however, That any rights or liabilities existing under such repealed sections or parts of sections shall not be affected by their repeal.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the bill just passed I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may be instructed to correct the enumerations in the paragraphs in line with the amendments that have been adopted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include the following explanation of the bill H. R. 10061 and amendments thereto, which passed the House today. The bill represents an effort on the part of the Committee on Revision of the Laws to consolidate the various exceptions to section 3709, Revised Statutes, appearing throughout the United States Code.

CONTENT—SECTIONS 1–3 OF BILL

An effort has been made to consolidate in the first three sections of this bill the provisions of all general and permanent Federal legislation making exceptions to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes. These provisions have been taken in most instances from prior appropriation acts, where they were originally set out as provisos to specific appropriations.

The bill includes all exceptions enumerated in 1940 appropriation acts received to June 27, 1940, which constitute chapters 27, 71, 107, 189, 313, 333, 343, and 396.

SECTION 4 OF THE BILL

A table of United States Code sections, referred to in section 4 of the bill, is incorporated as an appendix. The table does not cite every appropriation act in which the provisos are repeated from year to year; however, it does include all citations now set out in the code as credits to the text of the several exceptions. Therefore, while the table does not exhaust the possible citations to appropriation acts, it identifies the text of the exceptions set out in the code and consolidated in this bill.

AGENCIES REORGANIZED

The Federal Home Loan Bank Board is now administered by the Federal Loan Administrator (Reorganization Plan No. I, sec. 402), but this change in administration should not affect the exception to Revised Statutes 3709.

The Rural Electrification Administration was transferred to the Department of Agriculture by Reorganization Plan No. II, section 5, but this should not affect the exception to Revised Statutes 3709.

The Bureau of Mines was transferred to the Department of the Interior by Executive Order No. 6611. Exception to Revised Statutes 3709 should remain intact.

The Bureau of the Budget was transferred to the Executive Office of the President by Reorganization Plan No. I, section 1. This exception to Revised Statutes 3709 should be retained despite the transfer.

The Social Security Board was transferred to the Federal Security Agency by Reorganization Plan No. I, section 201. The exception for this Board should remain intact.

FORM OF BILL

All uniform exceptions relating to independent offices and departments have been grouped under specific sums in section 1. Exceptions which could not be listed in section 1 of this bill because of some special difference have been set forth in section 2. Effort has been made to preserve the original substance of all exceptions consolidated in this bill. Only changes in form have been made.

FUTURE LEGISLATION

If this bill becomes law and if additional departments and independent offices are to be excepted from the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, it is hoped this bill will be amended to include the new exceptions, in order that such exceptions may always be found in convenient form and in one place.

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT FOR AMENDMENTS TO H. R. 10061—FIRST AMENDMENT

Amendment merely transposes words "independent offices and departments."

SECOND AMENDMENT

The Department of Labor was erroneously listed under subdivision (b) of section 1 ($50) and is therefore being transferred to the list under subdivision (c) of section 1 ($100).

THIRD AMENDMENT

The Indian field service was erroneously listed under subdivision (b) ($50)—actually the exemption for this office is $100. It is covered in the words "bureaus and offices" in amendment adding the Department of the Interior as subdivision (g) under section 2.

FOURTH AMENDMENT

The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics formerly appeared in title 50, section 154, but is being transferred in supplement VI to title 41, section 611. This exemption should be consolidated with the others.

FIFTH AMENDMENT

The Navy Department was added to the list of exceptions this year by act June 11, 1940, chapter 313, title I, 54 Statute.

SIXTH, SEVENTH, AND EIGHTH AMENDMENTS

These amendments substitute the Civil Aeronautics Board for the Air Safety Board, the Bureau of Air Commerce, and the old Civil Aeronautics Authority for the following reasons:

First. The Air Safety Board in the old Civil Aeronautics Authority was consolidated in the Civil Aeronautics Board by the Reorganization Plan No. IV, section 7.

Second. The Bureau of Air Commerce was transferred to the old Civil Aeronautics Authority by act June 23, 1938, chapter 601, section 203, 52 Statute 982.

NINTH AMENDMENT

This amendment is explained in statement for second amendment.

TENTH AMENDMENT

Same as first amendment.

ELEVENTH AMENDMENT

Subsections (b) and (c) of section 2 as inserted by this amendment formerly appeared in title 40, sections 217b and 217, respectively. They have been transferred to title 41, sections 6kk and 6jj, respectively, in supplement VI. These subsections should be consolidated with the other exceptions.

TWELFTH AMENDMENT

The twelfth amendment inserts exception formerly appearing in title 15, section 198, which has been transferred to title 41, section 6ii for supplement VI. It should also be consolidated with the other exceptions.

THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT

This amendment inserts exception for the Department of the Interior, and so forth, which will appear in supplement VI as title 41, section 6a–1. This amendment also includes the Indian field service referred to in the third amendment. It should be noted that Howard University and Columbia Institution for the Deaf were transferred to the Security Agency by Reorganization Plan No. IV, section 11; however, they are retained under the heading "Department of the Interior" because the final provisions thereunder appear unaffected by the mere transfer of these institutions to the Federal Security Agency.

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT

This amendment merely changes form of section, required by the addition of three new paragraphs.

FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT

This amendment inserts the word "hereby" in the interest of clarity.

SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT

This amendment repeals provisions of title 45, section 164, relating to Board of Mediation, which Board was abolished by title 45, section 154.

It also repeals the exception relating to the Veterans' Bureau which was consolidated in the Veterans' Administration by title 38, section 11.

Finally it repeals the provisions in title 41, section 6, relating to the Federal Civil Works Administration, which agency has been supplanted by the Work Projects Administration. Exception to Revised Statutes 3709 for the Work Projects Administration will be found in the Federal Emergency Relief Appropriations Act set out as notes under title 15, section 728, but since their application is confined to the particular appropriation act in which they appear no W. P. A. exception has been incorporated in this bill.

SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT

This amendment adds tables to cover additions made throughout the bill by the other amendments.

EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

This amendment supplies omission of "6."

NINETEENTH AMENDMENT

This amendment is covered by statement for seventeenth amendment.

TWENTIETH AMENDMENT

Same as seventeenth amendment.

BRIDGE ACROSS WABASH RIVER NEAR MOUNT VERNON, IND.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9952, authorizing the Indiana State Toll Bridge Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Wabash River at or near Mount Vernon, Posey County, Ind.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, the Indiana State Toll Bridge Commission is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Wabash River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Mount Vernon, Posey County, Ind., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the Indiana State Toll Bridge Commission all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, maintenance, and operation of such bridge and its approaches, as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said Indiana State Toll Bridge Commission is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. In fixing the rates of toll to be charged for the use of such bridge the same shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of such bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible, under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls. An accurate record of the cost of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

USE AND DISPOSITION OF THE BEQUEST OF THE LATE JUSTICE OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES

The Clerk called the next business, House Joint Resolution 550, to provide for the use and disposition of the bequest of the late Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes to the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there is no one who had more respect for the late Justice Holmes than I. I think at the proper time, when this Government can afford it, we should make available to all of the libraries of this country his works and his opinions. He wrote some of the most illuminating and most useful minority opinions that the Supreme Court has ever passed down, but this measure involves expense to the Government, an expense which is not necessary at this particular time, when every dollar we can get hold of should be spent in defense of this country, and I think if Justice Holmes were alive today he would request that this matter be delayed until the country is in better shape to do this great work.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. May I suggest to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter that has been under consideration by a commission appointed for that purpose, consisting of five members of the Supreme Court, five Members of this body, and five Members of the Senate. We have had many meetings and have gone over the matter from A to Z and back again and we have done the best we know how.

I doubt whether any Member here who has not met with us and discussed it as we have done would be able to suggest a disposition of that money as well as this resolution disposes of it. Unless the gentleman has some special reason for it I suggest that he permit the bill to be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the request of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserved the right to object to make a statement. I think the committee has done a fine job, and under ordinary circumstances there surely would be no objection to permitting this bill to be passed. I have no criticism of the committee and I have no criticism of the plan which they have outlined here to distribute those works, but there is considerable expense involved to the Federal Government. This distribution is not made out of the legacy which Mr. Justice Holmes left. It is made by an appropriation, and for that reason I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. KELLER. I shall have to object. If the gentleman wants to take the responsibility of objecting, all right.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard to the request of the gentleman from Michigan. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I think I have made myself clear in the reason given for asking that this bill go over without prejudice. I have no objection to the purpose of the bill. I am just trying to protect a situation here in which we all have a responsibility on both sides of the House, the membership of the House who feel as keenly on this question of national defense and Government finance as I do. Of course, the gentleman has placed me in a position where I am forced to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard, and the Clerk will call the next bill.

ALASKA GAME LAW

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8474) to further amend the Alaska game law.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RETIRED LIST, NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 9688) to provide for advancement on the retired list of any officer of the Navy or Marine Corps retired pursuant to the provisions of section 13 or 15 (e) of the act of June 2, 1938.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any officer of the Navy or Marine Corps who has heretofore been placed on the retired list pursuant to the provisions of section 13 or 15 (e) of the act of June 23, 1938 (52 Stat. 944), or both of such sections, shall receive the retired pay of a rear admiral of the upper half.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

J. K. LOTA AND ASSOCIATES, HAWAII

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 9123) to approve Act No. 65 of the Session Laws of 1939 of the Territory of Hawaii, entitled "An act to amend Act 29 of the Session Laws of Hawaii, 1929, granting to J. K. Lota and associates a franchise for electric light, current, and power in Hanalei, Kauai, by including Moloaa within such franchise."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Act No. 65 of the Session Laws of 1939 of the Territory of Hawaii, entitled "An act to amend Act 29 of the Session Laws of Hawaii, 1929, granting to J. K. Lota and associates a franchise for electric light, current, and power in Hanalei, Kauai, by including Moloaa within such franchise," passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii and approved by the Governor of the Territory of Hawaii on April 20, 1939, be hereby approved.

SEC. 2. This act shall be in force and effect from and after its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ELECTRIC CURRENT IN HAWAII

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 9124) to approve Act No. 214 of the Session Laws of 1939 of the Territory of Hawaii, entitled "An act to amend Act 105 of the Session Laws of Hawaii, 1921, granting franchise for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric current for light and power within Kapaa and Waipouli in the district of Kawaihau on the island and county of Kauai, by including within said franchise the entire district of Kawaihau, island of Kauai."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Act No. 214 of the Session Laws of 1939 of the Territory of Hawaii, entitled "An act to amend Act 105 of the Session Laws of Hawaii, 1921, granting franchise for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric current for light and power within Kapaa and Waipouli in the district of Kawaihau on the island and county of Kauai, by including within said franchise the entire district of Kawaihau, island of Kauai," passed by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii and approved by the Governor of the Territory of Hawaii on May 12, 1939, be hereby approved.

SEC. 2. This act shall be in force and effect from and after its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

REFUGEE CHILDREN

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 10213) to permit American vessels to assist in the evacuation from the war zones of certain refugee children.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to propound a parliamentary inquiry. I have been informed that a rule has been granted for the consideration of this bill. I inquire now whether a rule has been granted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised by the Clerk that there is a rule providing for its consideration.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I object to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that the bill be passed over without prejudice? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE NATIONAL GUARD

The Clerk called the bill (S. 3619) relating to changes in the administration of the National Guard of the United States bearing on Federal recognition, pay, allotment of funds, drill, training, etc.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the bill is not eligible for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill H. R. 10061, relative to the Revised Statutes of the United States Code.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMITTING AMERICAN VESSELS TO ASSIST IN EVACUATION OF REFUGEE CHILDREN

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOOM. I would like to ask what action was taken on Calendar No. 893, H. R. 10213, the child-refugee bill; whether it was objected to or whether it was passed over?

The SPEAKER. It was passed over without prejudice, the Chair is informed.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I believe the gentleman from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON] objected to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan made the request that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLOOM. But the gentleman objected to it at the time, because if that had not been the case I would have objected to it going over without prejudice. I thought the objection that the gentleman from Montana made, was the objection that was acted upon, because the gentleman objected several times. I would like to have the RECORD show that the gentleman objected to it.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLOOM. The regular order is to get the RECORD right.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Well, the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. BLOOM. I am not out of order. If I am, the Speaker is the one to pass on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor. In answer to the statement made by the gentleman from New York, the Chair is quite clear in his recollection, and the RECORD will sustain it. When this bill was called the Chair asked about objection to its consideration. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] submitted a request, which the Chair entertained, that the bill be passed over without prejudice. That was the pending parliamentary situation at the time. While that question was pending, the gentleman from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON] objected, but there was still pending the formal request of the gentleman from Michigan that the bill be passed over without prejudice. The Chair submitted, and there was no objection to his request that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to state, the gentleman from Montana objected, because I was watching it very carefully. The gentleman objected first and then the gentleman from Michigan made his request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana did state that he objected to the bill. The Chair presumes the RECORD will show that. But that was not at the time the pending parliamentary proposition.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill H. R. 10213, because I would object to the gentleman's request to have it go over without prejudice. If any Member desires to object to the bill, he can do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] to return to the bill H. R. 10213 for consideration?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I object to that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the reason why I made my request that the bill go over without prejudice was because a rule had been granted for the consideration of this bill. The Chair will recall I propounded a parliamentary inquiry to confirm the information which I had that a rule had been granted. I understand that a rule had been granted this morning. I have no objection to the bill, but I think, in view of the situation which has developed, we should give more consideration to the bill on the floor, and for the reason that a rule has been granted, in which we will all have an opportunity to discuss the bill, I object to the consideration of the bill at this time. I will reserve that objection in order to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In view of the fact that this bill will permit one adult to be brought over in American ships for each refugee child, do you not believe we ought to have a quorum if we are going to consider this bill at this time?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not care to pass upon the merits of the bill or the manner in which the House shall consider it, as long as it is considered under the rule which has been granted, and I am assured by the Chair and by the rule that adequate consideration will be given to the bill. If there are objections to it they will be stated. I do not object to the bill.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. I agree there is an opportunity to bring it up under a rule, but this is very urgent. Rules have been laid over for months, and this is a very urgent matter.

Mr. WOLCOTT. This rule has not laid over for months. It was only filed this morning.

Mr. BLOOM. I know, but I have a rule that has been laid over for 2 or 3 months.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But that is not in connection with this matter.

Mr. BLOOM. This is a very urgent matter, and I do not see why it cannot be brought up now. I cannot see how anyone can object to this bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It must be very evident to the gentleman that we cannot pass this bill by unanimous consent today.

Mr. BLOOM. Let us try and see if we cannot. If anyone wants to object to the bill, if anyone wants to object to bringing these refugee children over here, all right, let them go on record.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have asked that this bill go over without prejudice. I will withdraw my objection to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded. The regular order is: Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] objects.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT—SPECIAL AGENTS

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 865, S. 2627, to empower and authorize special agents and such other employees of the Division of Investigations, Department of the Interior, as are designated by the Secretary of the Interior for that purpose, to administer oaths in the performance of their official duties.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE STRAITS OF MACKINAC

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 775, S. 1379, granting the consent of Congress to the Mackinac Straits Bridge Authority to construct maintain, and operate a toll bridge or series of bridges, causeways, and approaches thereto, across the Straits of Mackinac at or near a point between St. Ignace, Mich., and the Lower Peninsula of Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not object if ample time is given to the discussion of this measure——

The SPEAKER. The bill, if considered, will be considered under the 5-minute rule, and the Chair feels that adequate discussion may be had under the rule.

Mr. DONDERO. I am satisfied this could not be presented in 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman might get an extension of his 5 minutes.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I think an extension of remarks would be futile because it would not be presented to the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be 20 minutes of general debate on this bill, to be divided between both sides.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Mackinac Straits Bridge Authority, created by Public Act No. 35 of the 1934 extra session of the Michigan State Legislature, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge, or series of bridges, causeways, and approaches thereto, across the Straits of Mackinac, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near a point between St. Ignace, Mich., and the Lower Peninsula of Michigan, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters,'" approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. If tolls are charged for the use of such bridge or series of bridges, causeways, and approaches thereto, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge or series of bridges, causeways, and approaches thereto, under economical management and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of the bridge or series of bridges, causeways, and approaches thereto, including at a rate not to exceed 5 percent per annum interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 30 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge or series of bridges, causeways, and approaches thereto, shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge or series of bridges, causeways, and approaches thereto, under economical management. An accurate record of the costs of the bridge or series of bridges, causeways, and approaches thereto, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to know who desires to be recognized on the bill?

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY].

The SPEAKER. This is a rather unusual parliamentary situation. Ten minutes a side has been allowed for general debate but no one has been indicated to control the time on the other side. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT] desires recognition and should have a portion of the time, and will be recognized for 5 minutes.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the State of Michigan is peculiarly divided into two peninsulas, Upper and Lower, the Lower Peninsula, in the main, running north and south and the Upper Peninsula running east and west. These two peninsulas are divided by a narrow part of the Great Lakes known as the Straits of Mackinac, which connects Lake Michigan with Lake Huron. The Straits of Mackinac, while unusually deep in the center, nevertheless run into comparatively shallow water on the northerly side, and in which area there are several dangerous reefs which are a constant menace to navigation.

The economic life of the Upper Peninsula of Michigan was formerly dependent upon vast areas of standing timber, huge deposits of iron ore and great quantities of copper located far underground. All three of these economic resources have been dissipated over the years.

The Lower Peninsula likewise was formerly largely dependent upon timber. Within recent years limestone has been a source of considerable income.

However, Mr. Speaker, both the northern end of the Lower Peninsula and the entire Upper Peninsula have now become primarily dependent upon the resort industry for their economic livelihood. To appreciate the importance of the tourist and resort business we must recall that our State income from that source was but $17,000,000 back in 1922, but this industry has been expanding very rapidly in direct proportion to the construction of a new vastly extended system of modern highways throughout the region. As a matter of fact, the tourist and resort industry is now the second largest industry in the State of Michigan and it has been reliably estimated that this industry brings into the State annually some $400,000,000 of income, the major portion of which accrues to this northern area of the State by reason of its ideal climate.

It is our bread and butter. Its very livelihood is dependent upon this system of highway transportation.

This system of highways of necessity terminates on both sides of the Straits of Mackinac and, consequently, we find our economic livelihood seriously hindered by this comparatively narrow body of water, which is only some 4 miles in width.

Since 1923 this highway traffic has been served more or less satisfactorily by a system of ferries owned and operated by the Michigan State Highway Department. It has been recognized for a number of years, by students of the subject, that eventually the ferry system would of necessity become entirely inadequate to properly serve this tremendous industry.

Students of the subject have realized that sooner or later this traffic can be handled only on a year-round basis with safety and dependability through the construction of a bridge or a tunnel.

A tunnel crossing of the Straits is not recommended by competent engineers on account of excessive cost, prohibitive grades, the great depth of water in the center of the channel, the limited capacity, and the continuing high operating and maintenance costs.

The purpose of this bill which we are considering, Mr. Speaker, S. 1379, as amended, is simply the granting of authority to the State of Michigan to bridge the Straits of Mackinac. It calls for no financial outlay on the part of the Federal Government; and if this House votes unfavorably on this measure, it is simply denying to the people of the State of Michigan the right to join the two peninsulas by a permanent bridge structure.

Now, Mr. Speaker, over the past few years there have been objections raised to this structure on the grounds that it was impossible, and even considered by some fantastic, from an engineering standpoint. It was considered that the cost might be tremendously excessive. It was considered to be economically unsound.

Back in 1934, by an act of the Michigan State Legislature, there was created the Mackinac Straits Bridge Authority to go into this matter from every angle. This is a bipartisan board of three members appointed by the Governor for a term of 6 years. The present board, operating in conjunction with experts of the Michigan State Highway Department, Michigan Department of Conservation, the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, and employing the engineering firm of Modjeski & Masters, of Harrisburg, Pa., in conjunction with Mr. Leon S. Moisseiff, consulting engineer of New York City, have just recently completed exhaustive engineering studies of this project. The findings are incorporated in a report which has just been made public within the past few days.

This report recommends—

> The construction of a three-lane highway bridge, consisting of two long suspension spans over the deep waters of the Straits with the necessary approaches at each end. The construction cost of the bridge project, ready for traffic, is estimated at $23,375,000, to which should be added the cost of the causeway, toll plaza, and connecting highway, which become a part of the bridge project when the bridge replaces the ferries, estimated at $965,000, and the cost of interest during construction, estimated at $2,400,000, making a total cost of the project of $26,740,000.
> If the bridge is completed, ready for traffic, by the spring of 1947, and the tolls on the bridge are the equivalent of the present ferry tolls, we estimate that the gross revenue from tolls for the first year of bridge operation will be not less than $925,000. The annual maintenance and operating costs should not exceed $160,000.
> In our opinion, it is both feasible and practicable to safely construct the recommended structure, which will serve as a useful means of joining the two major peninsulas comprising the State of Michigan.

The consulting engineers further recommended immediate construction of a causeway approximately one mile in length southward from the St. Ignace shore, from the end of which the ferries can be operated until a permanent crossing is built, thus increasing the present ferry capacity about 50 percent without greatly increasing the investment in ferry properties, this causeway to become an approach to the recommended crossing. The cost of this causeway is estimated at approximately $825,000, the buildings and toll plaza at approximately $40,000, the connecting highway at approximately $100,000, the temporary ferry dock at approximately $250,000, making a total cost of the project $1,215,000. Of these latter charges, only the temporary ferry dock will not be used after the bridge is open to traffic, which, if started tomorrow, cannot be completed until early in 1947.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned that the ferries will soon prove totally inadequate to serve the 2 peninsulas. The State of Michigan now owns and operates 5 ferries, 3 of which carry approximately 60 cars each. The 2 larger ferries, which are reconditioned car ferries, have a capacity of approximately 100 cars each. In addition to that, the State has a charter arrangement for the operation of 2 additional car ferries with about the same capacity. These latter ferries operate throughout the winter months and are designed as ice crushers. The Straits of Mackinac are frozen over about three months each winter and during that time these ferries attempt to keep two channels open between the two peninsulas. At times, due to shifting winds disturbing the ice, that ice has been known to be forced downward to the bottom of the lake, near the docks, and to be pushed up sometimes as high as 50 feet, making it absolutely impossible for these ferries to get to their docks with the result that the peninsulas have often been isolated without any service for days on end. On such occasions, traffic and mail service, of course, are stopped completely and at such times we find that it takes mail 4 days to cover this airline distance of some 4 miles by reason of the fact that it has to go via Detroit and Chicago. The traveling public is, of course, tremendously inconvenienced and there have been occasions when sick and injured have been stranded in ambulances on the ferries for several days at a time. Traveling men from lower Michigan have been forced to leave their cars in the Upper Peninsula and return by train via Chicago.

Any ferry service can be adequate only when and if it is sufficiently equipped to take care of the peak loads. Out of the approximately 300,000 cars which crossed on the ferries last year, it is safe to say that three-fourths of this traffic crossed the Straits during the months of July and August, over the various holidays, and during the hunting season. At such times, despite the fact that all 7 boats are pressed into service, without any attempt at maintaining a definite schedule, but simply loading and unloading as rapidly as possible, it is not infrequent that cars are delayed for hours at either end of the line; and in fact just last Saturday afternoon, I saw a double line-up of cars over a mile long awaiting transportation across the Straits.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. As I understand, this bill is merely an authorization for the Federal Government, because it has control over navigable waters, to the State of Michigan to construct this bridge, and I understand further that no cost on the part of the Federal Government is involved. Am I right?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. The gentleman is correct. This is simply an authorization measure that we are considering. The people of the State of Michigan cannot build a bridge across these Straits unless Congress gives its consent and gives the State authority so to do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know there are some people who say, and they are entirely justified in saying, that many of our tourists enjoy this little boat trip of approximately one hour across this 9½-mile route, which is the present course of the ferries as shown on this map. But I say also that their joy and anticipated pleasure of the boat trip is considerably dimmed by any such periods of exasperating waiting.

Now, this chart here [indicating], Mr. Speaker, clearly shows the source from which this traffic originates. It proves beyond all question of doubt that this proposed bridge and these ferries will and are serving people from all over these United States. For instance, in the year 1937 we find 32 cars came from Hawaii; from western Canada, 1,677; northeast Canada, 2,322; Illinois, over 14,000; Indiana, 8,600; Ohio, 20,000; and New York State, over 2,000; and so it goes, Mr. Speaker, with cars coming from all over the United States.

It has been contended by some of the opponents to this measure that this bridge represents a local demand to handle local traffic. This chart [indicating] completely offsets that argument because this shows the contributions of the counties of Michigan to the Mackinac Straits ferry traffic, and from this we notice that Wayne County leads with some 58,000 cars; Oakland, 7,371; Genesee, 11,694; Saginaw, 6,216; Bay, 4,213; and going over to the other side of the State we see that Kent County, in which Grand Rapids is located, contributed 8,858 cars; Ingham, 8,229; Muskegon, 2,862; and Kalamazoo, 3,050. All this, Mr. Speaker, as opposed, for instance to my own county, Presque Isle, in the northern part of the Lower Peninsula, with 793 cars. Now, let us go into the Upper Peninsula: Chippewa sends 10,500 over the Straits; Luce, 2,400; Houghton, 2,361; Delta, 2,362; and so we see, Mr. Speaker, this chart graphically represents that the demand for this bridge should and does come from the automobile traffic of the entire State of Michigan, as well as of the entire United States.

Mr. Speaker, before I close this argument, I want to refer to the subjects of safety and national defense. It is a well-recognized fact that 86 percent of the iron ore in the United States comes from the huge deposits in the Lake Superior region. All of this tonnage must, of necessity, go through the locks at Sault Ste. Marie. As a matter of interest, it is well to recall that in the 7½ months annual navigation season more tonnage passes through the Soo Locks than through the Panama, Suez, Kiel, and Welland Canals. A great portion of this tonnage, Mr. Speaker, as well as a great deal of the limestone tonnage, of equal importance in the manufacture of iron and steel, passes through the Straits of Mackinac. Navigating the Straits is made difficult by reason of currents which at times reach a velocity of 11 miles per hour. Oftentime in periods of storm and poor visibility, or in periods of fog, this current is sufficiently strong so that the navigators, fearful of the reefs and shoals existent in the Straits, as previously mentioned, hesitate to check the speed of their steamers to a point at which steerage way is endangered; and, consequently, you can well imagine the hazard existent in bad weather when this fleet of seven ferries has to constantly operate directly across the path of this great fleet of lake freighters. It will be far safer from a navigating viewpoint for the masters of these freighters to travel through a 4,600-foot fixed span in bad weather than it is for them to dodge this fleet of ferries. This is particularly true when one appreciates that if the summer traffic follows its present trend it must be necessary to double or treble the present fleet within a comparatively few years. It is, of course, contemplated by the design engineers that the proposed bridge will not only have mounted on the center towers suitable aerial beacons as a warning to not only sea-borne but aerial traffic as well, and will have in the center of the center span a suitable radio beacon to guide the steamers through the span in all kinds of weather. So I say that it will be far safer to navigate the Straits through two fixed anchorages, 4,600 feet apart, than it will be with 10 to 15 moving ferries operating at slow speeds on a course subject to change by currents in periods of bad weather.

Last year two of the ferries came together in a collision in a fog, and, fortunately, no one was injured; but if ever one of these ferries is rammed by a freighter in these Straits, we may expect a public outcry caused by unnecessarily sacrificed human lives such as has been seldom raised in this country.

We hope that it shall never be necessary to move any large complement of troops and equipment to the Sault to protect those locks, which I have previously stated are so vital to the flow of ore to the great steel mills of this Nation; but if that should ever be necessary, this bridge will, of course, perform yeoman service.

It has been stated, Mr. Speaker, by some of the opponents to this measure that the bridge is not economically sound. I will agree it is possible this bridge may operate at a loss for a few years. I want to make this observation, however: Competent bridge experts testify that when a bridge supplants ferry traffic there is usually an increase of some 26 percent in traffic. It will be argued, of course, that the Detroit River Ambassador Bridge has been a financial "white elephant." There are grave mitigating circumstances in that instance. In the first place, that bridge was built while we had prohibition in this country and there was a tremendous intercity travel from Detroit to Windsor. Shortly before the bridge was completed prohibition was repealed, with a tremendous natural decrease in traffic. In addition to that, a tunnel was built under the Detroit River much more centrally located and the ferries across the Detroit River continued to operate. All of which considerably operated to the detriment of the success of the Ambassador Bridge.

Offsetting that, however, we have the example of the Bluewater Bridge at Port Huron. This bridge was opened in October 1938. It was planned to amortize the bonds over a 20-year period. The traffic over this bridge in its first year of operation was so satisfactory that had it continued it would have been possible to completely pay out this bridge in 12 years. The European war caused some drop in the traffic, and since July 1 of this year, when we put through rigid immigration laws and restrictions operating on that bridge, the traffic has dropped off 80 percent. But the fact that I am stressing is this, that the Bluewater Bridge operating primarily on tourist travel more than substantiates the 26-percent increase to be expected when a bridge supplants ferry traffic.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if the State of Michigan receives an annual revenue from the tourist industry of around $400,000,000, half of which at least can reasonably be expected to go into the northern counties of our State, and if this bridge will serve to increase this revenue by only 10 percent, then certainly it takes no Solomon to determine that this bridge is more than a good investment and a sound investment for the people of the State of Michigan.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this bill is simply an authorization measure carrying no appropriations whatsoever, I sincerely hope that the House will not seriously object to the passage of this legislation, which has already passed the Senate.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ALEXANDER. What is the method to be used for the passage of boats under and through the bridge?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I will take just a minute to explain the bridge proper as shown on this picture [indicating]. Starting at St. Ignace, in the northern peninsula, it is proposed to build a causeway approximately 1 mile long—to be exact, 5,470 feet—toward the end of which it is proposed to build a temporary ferry dock, which will reduce the distance of crossing the Straits to a little over 3 miles. I have previously told you that the ferries now travel over 9 miles. Due to the time necessarily consumed in loading and unloading the ferries, this will reduce the total crossing time to approximately 50 percent, or, in other words, will have the effect of an immediate doubling of the capacity of the present ferry system. Then continuing toward Mackinaw City we have a ramp approach of 3,486 feet before we get into the suspension bridge part of the structure. The initial suspension span to the first tower is 1,600 feet, and then we have the main span, which is 4,600 feet between towers, which, incidentally, will be the longest single span in the world. As I have told you previously, the two main towers—these two here [indicating]—will have aerial light beacons on top to warn steamers as well as aircraft; and in the center of the long span it is proposed to install a radio beam, which will guide steamers through this gap. The plans call for this center span to be 150 feet above the mean lake elevation. Incidentally the water at this point is 280 feet deep. It is 90 feet deep on the north side of this span and 125 feet deep on the southerly side of the span. Then we continue 1,600 feet to the next main tower, then 1,050 feet, and then this next subordinate suspension is 2,950 feet between towers, with a water depth of between 25 and 75 feet, which will take care of the smaller craft. And then we have a span of 1,050 feet approaching the Mackinaw City shore and a 684-foot approach to the beach.

I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that the captains of lake freighters have told me that they would far rather navigate under this bridge, equipped as it will be with up-to-date aids to navigation—meaning sufficient lights, radio beacons, and so forth—than they would through a continuous moving stream of automobile ferries laden with human life.

Mr. Speaker, this bill simply grants the permission of this Congress to the State of Michigan to join its two peninsulas by a bridge. It has the approval of the War Department, and the Department of Agriculture, and comes to the floor of this House with the unanimous recommendation of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Mr. Speaker, if this House should defeat this measure, I feel that it might be construed as seriously encroaching on State's rights, that it would be setting itself up, as it were, as some superbody deciding whether or not the State of Michigan had the right to join itself by a permanent structure.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the State of Michigan have said that they want this bridge, that they recognize its engineering feasibility and its economic desirability. The State of Michigan without this legislation can never start this bridge, nor can it even secure the formal approval of the War Department to its designs of any structure that they propose. Therefore, I sincerely hope and expect that this House will accord to the great State of Michigan the privilege of connecting that heretofore comparatively segregated, and in the wintertime almost completely isolated portion, of the Upper Peninsula with the Lower Peninsula through the means of an adequate permanent structure by which neither ice, wind, fog, nor any stress of weather may delay our life-giving and life-sustaining highway traffic. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Does any other Member desire to speak in opposition to the bill with the exception of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO]?

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] wants to speak in opposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] for 5 minutes.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, for 8 years I have stood on the floor of this House opposing the pending proposal, S. 1379), to grant to the State of Michigan the right to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Straits of Mackinac, and I have opposed it mainly on the ground that there is no economic justification for the passage of the bill; secondly, that no great necessity as yet exists for a bridge being built across the Straits of Mackinac.

According to the estimate which has been submitted by competent engineers this project involves an expenditure of $27,000,000, and other estimates on this proposal have run as high as $50,000,000. While I concede that this bill does not cost the Federal Government one dollar, and that it simply grants consent to the State of Michigan to build a bridge, it throws this matter into the laps of the taxpayers of my State.

The State of Michigan, through its highway department, has constructed steel and concrete docks at Mackinaw City on the south side of the Straits of Mackinac and at St. Ignace on the north side of the Straits; and through its highway department operates, at the present time, five ships or ferries on a very frequent and regular service and at a moderate cost to the people using them.

The five ferries now operating across the Straits of Mackinac provide a very efficient and a very delightful service of about 45-minute intervals. The service is adequate with the exception of occasional holidays, the Fourth of July, Labor Day, and during the hunting season, when there is some congestion. The total investment of the State of Michigan in docks and ships is about $3,000,000.

If the permission sought by this bill is granted, my State will be compelled to pass upon the subject whether or not it should build a bridge costing $27,000,000, accepting the lowest estimate, while the total income from the ferry service today is about $500,000 annually. What does it mean? If the proposed bond issue is to be amortized in 30 years, as the bill provides, and figuring interest as low as 4 percent, there must be an annual income of $2,000,000 to warrant or justify this undertaking. With an annual income of only $500,000, where is the balance of $1,500,000 to come from? It will need to come from the pockets of the taxpayers of the State of Michigan. According to the report filed by the Mackinac Straits Bridge Authority of Michigan for June 1940, the estimated income in 1960, 20 years from now, shows there would still be a deficit of more than $1,000,000 a year from the revenues of the bridge in order to maintain it, pay the interest on the bonds, and amortize the principal.

The present administration rejected this project as one not meeting the qualifications of projects on which public money was to be expended, and when this administration rejects a project on which public money is to be spent, it means but one thing, that it is repugnant and offensive to the most calloused conscience.

Certainly it is easy to say that this bill costs the Federal Government nothing. But we have some big-bridge history in Michigan that is sad and tragic. We built the Ambassador Bridge across the Detroit River from Detroit, Mich., to Windsor, Ontario, a bridge that is less than a mile long. It cost $17,000,000 and began operation in 1933. Do you know what the record is of that bridge?

Not one dollar of interest has yet been paid on the bond issues, and to date the accumulated unpaid interest on that venture is two-thirds of the original cost of the bridge, or about $12,000,000. I am informed the bonds have depreciated in value from 100 cents on the dollar to 6 cents, and it is quite probable that thousands of innocent people will lose their entire investment in this unsound proposal. It was undoubtedly urged by painting the same glowing picture of future income, predictions, and hopes of earnings that is urged for this proposal.

Do you want to lay in the laps of the people of Michigan another bridge proposal that will have a record similar to the Ambassador Bridge in Detroit? That is what you will be doing if you vote for this bill, and this Congress will become a party to this unsound proposal.

For the reasons given, I am opposed to it.

Mr. Speaker, the Straits of Mackinac is one of the finest bodies of water in this world. It is one of the most beautiful and enchanting regions in all America. God has been generous to that great North country up there, and now man thinks he can improve on its beauty with concrete and steel. If you have ever been across the Straits of Mackinac, you know exactly what I am talking about. We have an efficient service, and until such time as there can be some economic justification shown for this bill it ought to be deferred until some future time; then pass on it and give the State of Michigan a chance to do something about it.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Speaking about the economic justification for the bridge, the gentleman realizes, does he not, that the tourist business in Michigan represents approximately $400,000,000 a year income and that the far greater proportion of that is in the upper half of Michigan?

Mr. DONDERO. Let me say to my good friend the gentleman from Michigan that the tourist trade at the Straits of Mackinac is increasing every year, not because there is or is not a bridge there but because there is a splendid and efficient State ferry operated by our highway department. The bridge has nothing to do with it. I predict that if this bill is laid aside the tourist trade will still continue to go to the Straits of Mackinac, because God put more there than man can put there for man's enjoyment.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Does the gentleman not know that within the next few years they will have to double or perhaps treble the number of ferries crossing the straits?

Mr. DONDERO. Possibly so; but at the present time the State of Michigan has less than $3,000,000 invested in the concrete and steel piers and docks and in the five ships especially designed and built to take care of that need. Anybody who has ever passed over those waters knows it is one of the most delightful links in the journey of the traveler. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRAWFORD rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] desire to oppose the bill?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman for 3 minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, we have a defense program on at the present time. It seems to me that if skilled mechanics and material are drafted for the building of a project of this kind, when its economic necessity cannot be justified, it is something for us to think about.

In the second place, when this project came to my attention first, some 6 years ago, I was then informed that it was proposed to issue income bonds, that those bonds were to carry the seal of the great State of Michigan, that they were to be signed by the treasurer of the State of Michigan, and that they were to be placed in the hands of the public, many of whom would have undoubtedly assumed that they were State bonds backed by the faith and the credit of the State of Michigan. Of course, I objected to that kind of what I call "bucket shop" bond selling.

At the present time it is impossible to obtain reliable information as to what kind of a bond will be issued for the purpose of financing the construction of the bridge. I am informed by one of the officials of the Highway Department of Michigan that one course to follow would be to dip into the gas revenues of the State in order to make up the bridge-operating deficit, which will probably run anywhere from $500,000 to $1,000,000 a year, as reported by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO]. So for various reasons along the line I am briefly touching on here today, I have requested from time to time that the bill be passed over without prejudice, awaiting developments, and today I shall vote against the bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT].

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, this bill involves no bonds at all. This bill simply asks permission of the War Department to give the State of Michigan the right to consider by its legislative body whether or not it wishes to go into the proposition of erecting a bridge across the Straits of Mackinac.

The tourist trade of Michigan is second only to the automobile business itself. Michigan is a progressive State. Michigan is anxious to keep its tourist trade and is anxious even to enlarge upon the facilities which it extends to its tourist trade. This tourist trade extends into the fall and winter months, when there is a great deal of hunting in the northern part of Michigan. People come to Michigan from all over the United States. Its shores are kissed by the waters of the Great Lakes, the greatest body of fresh water in the world.

For these reasons we have felt that it is only proper that this bill should be considered by the House. Incidentally, it has been objected to consistently, as gentlemen have admitted here, for the past 6 or 8 years. It was originally introduced by Senator BROWN when he came to Congress 8 years ago.

Some reference was made to the Ambassador Bridge. The Ambassador Bridge was a private enterprise. No sooner was the Ambassador Bridge erected across the Detroit River between Detroit and Windsor than somebody started to build a tunnel under the river. The tunnel is so much more convenient than the bridge that the tunnel stole the traffic and the show, and the bridge has had little traffic. It is a loss to those who privately invested in it.

This is to be a State-owned bridge if it is ever erected, and the matter is going to be considered by a legislature, which in Michigan is usually a Republican legislature. I am quite surprised, of course, that the bill has received this objection from that side of this House.

This bill will not cost the Federal Government a cent; not a cent. The tourist trade, as has been rightfully said by my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY], amounts to in excess of $400,000,000 a year. Everyone knows what it is to cross by boat waters that at certain times of the year are disturbed and turbulent when the weather is rough. This bridge is to avoid that. The last time I went up there, when I went up to the convention, I got soaked standing near the rail—externally so. [Laughter.]

I make an appeal to this House to pass this bill, to give authority to the War Department to approve this proposition. There are causeways to be built, approaches to this bridge. The bridge is to be something slightly in excess of 3 miles in length. The distance across, and I believe my colleague will bear me out, is about 5 miles. This fill-in is to be made by the State Highway Department. One more point: This bridge will in no way interfere with navigation. Its elevation will be at least 150 feet above the water.

For all these reasons, we submit this proposition to the judgment of this body.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RABAUT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. The causeway the gentleman referred to is proposed to be built so that we can cut the ferry distance to about a third, cut it down to about 3 miles, which will materially increase the present ferry capacity.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RABAUT. I yield to my distinguished friend from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman spoke of the Detroit tunnel. Is it not a fact that the Detroit tunnel is in the hands of a receiver?

Mr. RABAUT. I do not know.

Mr. DONDERO. I understand that is the case.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RABAUT. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is it not a fact that often during the summer months and in the fall there is a line of cars from a mile to a mile and a half long waiting to cross on the ferry, although they have three or four boats?

Mr. RABAUT. The gentleman is absolutely right, and we also have a great deal of trouble in breaking the ice up there at certain times of the year in order to cross.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RABAUT. I yield to my colleague from Michigan.

Mr. LESINSKI. With respect to the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] regarding the Ambassador Bridge, I understand the actual cost of the bridge was about $6,000,000, although the bondholders paid $17,000,000, and somebody got the rest of it.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, there are 2 minutes remaining, and as a member of the subcommittee on bridges of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I would like recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts for 2 minutes.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, since our former colleague, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] first introduced this measure some 6 years ago, I have had the pleasure of serving on the subcommittee which considered the measure. We have held extensive hearings for citizens of Michigan who wanted this legislation. Our committee, during all these years, have approached this subject from the viewpoint that the jurisdiction of Congress in respect of this matter lies entirely in granting consent to the State of Michigan itself. The Congress assumes no liability in the matter, but if its own legislature decides that they want to build this bridge, then under the terms of this measure they have congressional consent.

After all these years and after careful consideration of the matter, our committee has unanimously approved this proposed legislation. We have the approval of the War Department and the approval of the Department of Agriculture, the two Departments that are concerned in the matter, with respect to whether this bridge is going to obstruct in any way navigation through the Straits of Mackinac. We find now that that situation would not be disturbed.

I may say to the House that our subcommittee and the full Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce unanimously recommend the approval of this legislation, and I certainly hope the Congress will act favorably upon it and give the State of Michigan the right to build the bridge if it so desires.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I will be very pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DONDERO. Does the gentleman know that this administration has rejected a proposal to lend money to build this bridge?

Mr. HOLMES. That is immaterial and has no bearing at all on the question of the consent of Congress in the matter.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield.

Mr. RABAUT. We are not asking the administration for any money to build this bridge.

Mr. HOLMES. Not at all.

Mr. DONDERO. Money was asked from W. P. A.

Mr. HOLMES. This bill does not deal with loans or grants. It does not prohibit the State of Michigan from asking for aid, if it so desires, but, fundamentally, the only question here is whether you will grant to the State of Michigan the right to build a bridge connecting two portions of that State or not. That is the congressional function that is involved here, and I say that Congress should grant that right to the State and then let the State decide what it wants to do when it comes to actually building the bridge. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, strike out all of lines 4 and 5, and the word "Legislature" in line 6, and insert "State of Michigan."

Page 2, line 17, after the word "and", insert the word "reasonable."

Page 2, line 23, after the word "tolls", strike out the remainder of line 23, and all of lines 24 and 25, and down to and including the word "management" in line 2 on page 3.

Amend the title.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONDERO. Under the rule under which we are now proceeding, would it be proper to ask for a division on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. Absolutely; it is always in order to ask for a division on a vote.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, on the passage of the bill I ask for a division.

The House divided; and the Speaker reported that there were—ayes 98, noes 4.

So the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting the consent of Congress to the State of Michigan to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge or series of bridges, causeways, and approaches thereto, across the Straits of Mackinac at or near a point between St. Ignace, Mich., and the Lower Peninsula of Michigan."

RECREATION FACILITIES WITHIN CHOPAWAMSIC PROJECT

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2493) to provide for the operation of the recreational facilities within the Chopawamsic recreational demonstration project, near Dumfries, Va., by the Secretary of the Interior through the National Park Service, and for other purposes, and pass the same.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the Senate bill?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I understand that this bill passed the House and that a similar bill passed the Senate, but that they did not meet on the way.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. That is correct.

Mr. MICHENER. And the purpose is to pass the Senate bill at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, this bill, I notice, provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall operate this park in the State of Virginia. How much will it cost our almost bankrupt Treasury?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. It will not cost anything. This is to be operated at a profit.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I am very glad to hear that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the lands comprising the Chopawamsic recreational demonstration project transferred to the Secretary of the Interior by Executive Order No. 7496, dated November 14, 1936, shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior through the National Park Service as part of the park system of the National Capital and its environs.

SEC. 2. The Director of the National Park Service, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized—

(a) To prescribe and collect fees and charges for such recreational and other facilities, conveniences, and services as may be furnished by the National Park Service for the accommodation of the public within the said area.

(b) To enter into a contract or contracts with any reliable person, organization, or corporation, without advertising and without securing competitive bids for the operation or performance of any such recreational or other facilities, conveniences, and services within the said area.

All revenues collected by the National Park Service, pursuant to the authority of this section, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 3. The director of the National Park Service, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to exercise and perform with respect to the said area all the powers and duties that are conferred and imposed upon him by law in relation to the construction, maintenance, care, custody, policing, upkeep, and repair of the public buildings and parks in the District of Columbia.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER, MEMPHIS, TENN.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 3929) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Memphis, Tenn., and ask unanimous consent that the House further insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. CHAPMAN, Mr. KELLY, and Mr. HOLMES.

INTERVENTION OF STATES IN CERTAIN LAWSUITS

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following report from the Committee on the Judiciary on the bill H. R. 7737, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 7737) entitled "An act to amend the Judicial Code by adding a new section thereto, designated as section 266a, to provide for intervention by States in certain cases involving the validity of the exercise of any power by the United States, or any agency thereof, or any officer or employee thereof, and for other purposes"

Your Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7737) entitled "An act to amend the Judicial Code by adding a new section thereto, designated as section 266a, to provide for intervention by States in certain cases involving the validity of the exercise of any power by the United States, or any agency thereof, or any officer or employee thereof, and for other purposes, together with the objections of the President thereto, having reconsidered said bill and the objections of the President thereto, report the same back to the House with the unanimous recommendation that said bill do pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

The bill gives the States the same character of right to intervene and protect the validity of their own statutes and customary powers when that validity is involved as was given the Federal Government by an act of 1937 in cases questioning the constitutionality of acts of Congress. The section provides notice to the States by the Federal courts where a question arises involving conflict of powers or exercise thereof between State and Federal instrumentalities. The bill as written makes the notice mandatory, but does not impose the burden of binding the State as a party in such a case unless the State actually does intervene and appear.

There are a great number of cases which have been decided adversely to the existence of State powers or in favor of the exercise of Federal powers in conflict therewith, to which the States have not been parties, and which have been conducted by private corporations or individuals free from State participation. The purpose and effect of this bill is to permit the States, through their attorneys general, to become actual parties where their interests are involved and to present evidence and argument in behalf of the State. Under the present law the State, through its attorney general, is permitted to file a brief amicus curiae. We do not regard this as adequate protection to the interests of the States. They ought to have the right to appear as a party litigant.

It is one of the outstanding developments of the constitutional law of this country, relating to the respective jurisdiction of the States and Federal Government, that in nearly all of the important cases establishing precedents involving these questions that the States have not been parties to the litigation.

When we consider the tremendous expansion in the activities of Federal bureaus, commissions, and administrative agencies which has occurred in the past few years, it seems to this committee that it is exceedingly important and vital that the interests of the States should be protected by giving them adequate opportunity to defend their jurisdiction and rights against undesirable encroachments.

It will be observed that the provisions of this bill make permissive the intervention by the attorney general of any State and are in no sense mandatory.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding? The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this report, as the House appreciates, has to do with veto messages. The Committee on the Judiciary will present another report.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, since the entire House is to vote on this bill, I think we ought to hear the objections of the committee and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman doing that, because I was about to make that point myself. In view of the fact that there are two veto messages to be considered, we hope that the hour will not be required, but, as stated by the gentleman from New York, in view of the fact that the Members of the House will have to vote on the veto messages, I very much regret the necessity of making the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Obviously there is no quorum present.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and twenty-five Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SATTERFIELD].

Mr. SATTERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it is one of the outstanding and remarkable developments of the constitutional law of this country relating to the respective jurisdiction of the States and Federal Government that in nearly all of the important cases establishing precedents involving this question the States of the Union have not been parties to that litigation.

I wonder if you would let me say that once again, because that is the crux of this bill. That is the heart of this bill.

It is a remarkable development of the constitutional law of our country relating to the respective jurisdiction of the States and Federal Government that in nearly all of the important cases establishing precedents involving this question the States have not been parties to that litigation.

I think when we come to consider the great expansion in the activities of Federal bureaus and of commissions and of administrative agencies throughout the country which has occurred in the past several years, it would seem to me, and I also bespeak the unanimous opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, that it is exceedingly important and vital that the interests of the several States should be protected by giving the States adequate opportunity to defend their jurisdiction and their rights against encroachment.

The bill gives the States the same right to intervene and to protect the validity of their own statutes and governmental powers when that validity is involved, as was given the Federal Government by an act passed by the Congress in 1937. That enactment dealt only with cases questioning the constitutionality of the acts of Congress. It concerned itself only with legislative enactments. The pending measure provides notice to the State by the Federal courts, where a question arises involving conflict of powers or the exercise thereof, between State and Federal instrumentalities. The bill as written makes the notice mandatory to the attorneys general, but does not impose the burden of binding the State as a party in such case, unless the State actually does intervene and appears.

There are a great number of cases which have been decided adversely to the existence of State powers, or in favor of the exercise of Federal powers in conflict therewith, to which the States have not been parties, and which have been conducted by private corporations or individuals, free from State participation.

The purpose, as succinctly and concisely as I can state it, of this bill is to permit the States through their attorneys general to become actual parties where their interests are involved, and to present evidence and arguments in behalf of the State. Under the present law a State, through its attorney general, may appear as a friend of the court. In other words, he may file a brief, amicus curiae; but that is not adequate. The States should be permitted to appear as a party litigant if the rights of the State and the power of the State is involved in that litigation in a Federal court within that State.

I have made quite an exhaustive study of the decisions on this point. I am not going to burden you with the reading of abstracts of decisions which I have here, but may I call your attention to just two so that you may get an idea of just how lack of State representation works.

Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Illinois Brick Co. (297 U. S. 447 (1936)): In this case the brick company sued the railroad to recover reparation awarded by the Illinois Commerce Commission on the ground of an excessive charge for intrastate transportation; the charge in question was authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The case was argued by attorneys for the two corporations. Justice Butler, giving the opinion of the Court, held that the State commission had no authority to treat as excessive a charge authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The decision cites section 13 (4) and section 15a (2) of the Interstate Commerce Act as authority for the regulation of the rate in question by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Steward Machine Co. v. Davis (301 U. S. 548 (1937)): In this case the question involved was the validity of provisions of the Social Security Act imposing taxes on employers of eight or more, with a 90-percent exemption for amounts paid to the State and by it deposited in the Treasury of the United States. The case was argued by various attorneys, including two amici curiae, but no State was represented. Justice Cardozo, giving the opinion of the Court, held that the provisions in question did not constitute an improper interference with the rights of the States. Justices McReynolds, Sutherland, Van Devanter, and Butler dissented, on the ground that the provisions constituted a Federal encroachment on the province of the States.

In these cases the attorney general had no chance to appear. It matters not what the decision of the court was, I submit to you in all fairness and earnestness, that these States were entitled, through their representative, the attorney general, to at least appear and, if they wished to do so, make their States actual parties. This bill would permit them so to do, and for what purpose? For no higher purpose than the private litigants enjoyed in that suit, for the purpose of adducing testimony, for the purpose of submitting argument, for the purpose of making up, if you please, that record in order that when and if it ever reached the Supreme Court of the United States it would be a complete record. For the State it would reflect the same wishes and hopes entertained by private litigants, and at the same time it would have given the State in which that issue had arisen, against whose powers the issue may militate, the same right to argue and testify and attempt to persuade the Supreme Court to reach a decision which the attorney general of that respective State thinks is meet and proper.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. In the Pennsylvania case which the gentleman cites, had there been any attempt by any State to become a party under the established rules and procedure?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I could not answer the gentleman on that point, but I would like to say—and I think I make a fair observation—that litigation of this sort is appearing so frequently in the courts, and particularly now, that there is no method by which notice could be given the attorneys general; and this bill provides such a method, that the attorney general of the particular State involved might have a chance not only to be apprised of the issues involved but to decide whether he wishes to become an active party to the case.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Would it be required that notice be given to each State under this bill?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. No; only to the State in which the issue arises.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK. The fact is that all the Governors and attorneys general who have expressed any opinion at all have given this bill their wholehearted support, is that not correct?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I thank the gentleman for his question. I have compiled from letters from attorneys general, a list. I will hurriedly run through the names of some of the States. Favorable letters have been received from the attorneys general of the States of Georgia, Pennsylvania, New York, Nebraska, Utah, North Carolina, Connecticut, Alabama, Missouri, Massachusetts, Vermont, Indiana, Tennessee, Kansas, and several others. I have not the file before me but others have written and wired to their Representatives here commending the pending legislation.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. The third paragraph of the President's veto message, found on page 2, called attention to the fact that the district courts of the United States now have discretion to permit notification, and so forth, and called attention to the rules of civil procedure.

Mr. SATTERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. It called attention to United States Code, title 28, section 723 C, which further says that the Supreme Court permits the filing of briefs as a friend of the Court. If they have all those rights now, what is the need of the legislation?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, because the answer to that observation of the President is that such action by the United States courts is discretionary. This bill asks for the right on behalf of States to have the attorney general appear in cases developing those issues.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does the discretion deny the right of a State to intervene?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I may say to the gentleman from Missouri that frequently the right ends with the filing of a brief amicus curiae.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Do not the attorneys general of the various States have meetings at various times?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Has this question ever been brought up at those meetings?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I think I can say without fear of contradiction, to the gentleman from Illinois, that while I cannot point to any collective official approval, the fact is that the attorneys general of the country are in favor of this bill.

Mr. KELLER. Why have they not taken action if they favor it?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. They have. I have a file filled with letters from attorneys general throughout the country.

Mr. KELLER. But no action has been taken by their association, as I understand it. So far as I know, it has not.

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I would not be able to answer that.

Mr. KELLER. Does it not occur to the gentleman that unless the attorneys general of the various States are sufficiently interested in the matter to have considered it in their association that this Congress ought to be extremely careful how it considers a bill of this kind?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. My answer to that is that they are interested in it as evidenced by the letters I have in my files. This legislation is needed from every point of view. Certainly the House ought to be very careful in its consideration.

Mr. KELLER. Does not the gentleman admit that the best judges of the question are the people most interested?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I have just told the gentleman that the attorneys general have been writing and wiring to their Representatives. I dare say that four-fifths of the States have wired their Congressmen and Senators in the matter.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I believe the gentleman from Illinois was not attentive at the time the gentleman from Virginia was reading the list of the attorneys general who have endorsed the bill.

Mr. KELLER. Yes; I understood that. I know pretty well the telegrams, and so on, that have come in, because I have heard the contents of them a number of times both here and outside; but it has occurred to me always that unless the attorneys general of their own accord, from their own association, should take action in the matter this body ought not itself to take action independently.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I suggest to my distinguished friend that the converse of that consideration appears in this particular situation. As I understand it, most of the attorneys general have asked for this legislation. It would seem to me that if the men who represent the States want the bill then the Congress ought to listen to their demand.

Mr. KELLER. The rule just quoted by the gentleman from Missouri gives them that very right.

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I doubt that.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. He will not say so.

Mr. COCHRAN. I do not know.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I ask my distinguished friend from Illinois if he does not believe that the attorneys general ought to have the right to intervene and defend their State when a right of their State is involved?

Mr. KELLER. I know that there is no body of men who are more capable and able of asking for what they want than are the attorneys general.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. They are asking for it now. Will the gentleman give it to them?

Mr. KELLER. They have not asked for it as I think they ought to.

Mr. SATTERFIELD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] objects because they have not asked for this collectively, but they have asked for it individually.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEALEY. May I say to the gentleman that during the pendency of this bill the attorney general of my State wrote to me and said he had examined the bill and that the State officials were very much in favor of the bill.

Mr. NORRELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. NORRELL. The point I am interested in is how the attorney general of a particular State will have notice of the pendency of any suit in which the State may be interested.

Mr. SATTERFIELD. The judge notifies him under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. What comment has the gentleman to make in reference to the fear of the President that if such authority is granted, private litigants will prevail in some way on the attorney general, bring pressure to bear upon the attorney general to intervene—naturally not interested so much in the State as in their own behalf?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I make this answer to the gentleman from Missouri in reference to that, and I respectfully do so because it indirectly involves also an answer to the President. In my part of the country it is exceedingly difficult to get the attorney general into a case unless he should be there, and I do not think many of them will be involved in trifling litigation.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Will not the gentleman say, as a lawyer, that being permitted to file a brief amicus curiae is a very poor remedy compared with intervening as a matter of right?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I say that in this instance it is thoroughly inadequate, a very courteous matter on the part of the court to be permitted to file a brief, but it has little efficacy when it comes to presenting your case on the part of whomsoever you represent.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. If the State becomes a party, the State will have a right to present evidence?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. That is right.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. And the attorney general or other legal counsel for the State will have the right to cooperate in the conduct of the case?

Mr. SATTERFIELD. And argue it.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Whereas when an amicus curiae brief is filed it may or may not be given much attention. There may or may not be afforded opportunity for oral or other argument in addition to the filing of a brief.

Mr. SATTERFIELD. That is true.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. This is an extremely important matter to those States west of the one hundredth meridian. The system of water rights there prevailing is not thoroughly understood in other parts of the country. Many do not understand and a few are bitterly hostile to the appropriation doctrine of water rights under which the so-called irrigated-land States were settled and have flourished. Some Federal officials seem to have the notion that we of the West should return to the riparian doctrine, which is wholly unsuitable to our conditions. Some officials appear to be seeking to gain Federal control over the waters in our States which long ago, by acts of Congress and repeated decisions of the United States Supreme Court, have been recognized as being in the control of the respective States of the West. We in the West, at least all those from the West to whom I have spoken, feel that the enactment of this bill is a vital matter.

Mr. SATTERFIELD. I thank the gentleman; and I should like to add that if the Federal Government should come into your State and claim that a certain part of your waters were navigable that had hitherto been understood not to be, you would have a right under this bill to have your attorney general appear in court and present evidence on behalf of the contention of your State and to argue the matter on its behalf.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I may say in reply to the gentleman that assertions by the Federal Government in regard to our water rights have come from the Federal Government, and we desire in the future to appear in the courts and to present our case.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman such time as he may desire to conclude.

Mr. SATTERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, when hearings were had on this bill before a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, a representative of the Attorney General of the United States was present and he had this to say about the bill. I particularly invite the attention of my distinguished friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

The representative of the Attorney General's office said this:

> I do not see why the States should not have the same right to intervene to protect the constitutionality of its own statutes as the Federal Government is given by the act of 1937 to intervene to protect the constitutionality of an act of Congress.

He further said:

> I am not intimating that there is any objection at all in permitting the State to intervene.

Mr. Speaker, I think this bill is a just one; it is a reasonable one; and it means a great deal to our country to see to it that if private litigants have a voice the States have no less. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to detain the House any longer than is necessary to give the Members in attendance an understanding of this bill. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SATTERFIELD], who has just addressed the House, I think very clearly explained the bill. It merely gives to the States or to their chief law officer, the opportunity to appear in the Federal courts when the interests of the States are involved.

The Committee on the Judiciary took the matter under consideration and without any dissent at all this bill was unanimously agreed to. There was no reason that suggested itself to a single member of the committee on either side of the House why the States of this country should not be privileged as a matter of right to litigate their questions of interest in those lawsuits in this country where their interests are involved. If there is any other Member who would like to have time, I will be glad to yield.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I would like some time.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS] such time as he may desire.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the author of the bill, I will speak for the passage of this bill, the veto notwithstanding. I want to be intensely practical, and I would like the attention of those who are seriously considering the question at issue.

The President in his veto message gives two reasons why this bill, in his opinion, should not become law: One is that the district courts of the United States now have discretion to permit intervention by a State in any action in which the State's claim or defense has a question of law or of fact in common with such action—Rules of Civil Procedure, rule 24, following United States Code, title 28, section 723c—that the various administrative tribunals permit intervention by States upon a showing of interest in their proceedings; and that the Supreme Court permits the filing of briefs by States as amici curiae as a matter of right—Revised Rules of the Supreme Court, rule 27, paragraph 9.

The veto message says:

> In my opinion those provisions are adequate.

The second reason given is that this bill does not provide for intervention by the States in cases involving the constitutionality of State statutes affecting the public interest.

The message suggests that the passage of this bill would impose more responsibility and work on the courts, and that it might hamper the judicial determination of the validity of the powers of the United States or their exercise by the proposed broader powers of intervention by the States, but the two reasons stated above seem to be the main objections that caused the veto.

I wish very briefly to address myself to each of them.

In the first place, there is a great deal of difference between permissive intrusion, as a matter of grace, and the exercise of a right. For grace you beg. A right is yours without supplication. In one case you are a guest in the house of your enemy; in the other, you are there as a joint owner, a tenant in common. In one case you must ask a favor; in the other you are asking no favor and receiving none. By mandate of the law you have the right to appear, and you can do so without supplication or apology.

As to his second point I am equally emphatic. The reason this bill does not permit a State to intervene when its own statutes are attacked as unconstitutional is that in any such event the State is immediately apprised of that attack and, possibly, the right to appear amicus curiae, by permission of the court, may be ample, because no court would deny to a State, one of whose own statutes was attacked as unconstitutional, the right to appear.

This is the reason for this bill, as I see it. The States, according to our fundamental law, are sovereign. They have all powers which they have not surrendered or delegated to the Federal Government.

The Federal Government is a government of delegated powers only. Therefore, this bill seeks to safeguard the States in their broad expanse of sovereignty beyond any assertion thereof by statute. Here the States have been undisputed monarchs. Into this realm the Federal power may not come without plain permission of the States. When, therefore, the Federal power therein intrudes it is manifestly fair that the States have notice and the right to resist the intrusion. If the exercise of Federal power be not unwarranted, the courts will so hold. But the right to challenge in the courts any new assertion of Federal authority in this area should not be left to chance nor to the grace of any tribunal; it should be fixed by the law of the land.

Federal power may be asserted and exercised in California; Maine may be affected thereby, but may never know until her rights have been, by the California case, at least partially foreclosed.

There may be a creek in Michigan, a mere trickle. The Federal Government by virtue of a decision of the Army engineers—and I have the highest regard for them and their deliverances—may claim that because that creek is capable of being made navigable it is a navigable stream.

Immediately the rights of Michigan with respect of jurisdiction and control over that creek are gone, unless that State is apprised of such adverse claim and defeats it. And a case in Michigan might become a potent precedent controlling the decision of a similar case in Florida, or some other State.

When a State statute is challenged on the ground of unconstitutionality the State will know about that and will probably be permitted to come in and defend; but in cases involving far more than a statute, attacking those great, outstanding, sovereign rights that are the test of your statehood, and which are infinitely more valuable than the upholding of some statute of your State, your State may not know of the threat until it is too late. This bill requires notice and gives to every State affected the right to be heard.

Why is there objection to making that the law? Surely the great Government created by the sovereign States of the American Union has no desire to take advantage of the States that gave it its very existence, and all of its powers.

Verily, the United States Government is and must ever remain above any thought of doing anything surreptitiously or seeking to deny any State the right of resort to the courts of the United States to determine questions of sovereignty. Can the Federal Government doubt the integrity of its own courts? Does the Government of the United States desire to take anything without vindicable right?

Mr. KEEFE and Mr. MAY rose.

Mr. HOBBS. The gentleman from Michigan rose first; inasmuch as I referred to his State, I shall be happy to yield to him first, and then I shall be equally glad to yield to the recently overwhelmingly renominated gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KEEFE. I may say to the gentleman that while I am not from Michigan, I am from a State contiguous to it.

Mr. HOBBS. Wisconsin; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. KEEFE. I wanted to say, as a contribution to the argument the gentleman has just made in response to the President's objection that this law does not provide for intervention by the States in cases involving the constitutionality of State statutes, that in the State of Wisconsin whenever in any case in any court the constitutionality of a law is involved, notice must be given to the Attorney General, and the right of intervention on the part of the State in that case, no matter what it is, is given to the State so that it may appear and defend, so that if in an isolated case in my State a question of the constitutionality of a statute were to arise, the State would be a party to that action by virtue of the laws of the State of Wisconsin.

In the event that proceeding were certioraried into the Federal courts and ultimately came into the Federal courts, the State itself would be a party all the way through by virtue of the rights given under the laws of the State of Wisconsin. I feel that this law is in line with the steps of proper protection of the rights of the States, and there ought to be no objection on the part of any Member of Congress to it.

Mr. HOBBS. I thank the gentleman for that contribution. I may state that I believe that is the law in practically every State in the Union; but even in those cases not covered by the local State law because originating in a Federal court, still there would be a permissive right to intervene granted where a State statute is involved. But those great cases involving inherent sovereignty far transcend in importance the life or death of one statute.

I am now happy to yield to the distinguished gentleman who is so graciously occupying the chair of our Committee no Military Affairs.

Mr. MAY. In my State we cannot even read a deposition taken against the interest of a party involving his individual rights and property rights without notice to that party. As I understand, unless this bill is enacted, a State may lose a constitutional right unless the attorney general is notified and is enabled to intervene where he may intervene.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I am always happy to yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. HANCOCK. Is not the opposition to this bill really based on the fact that it puts a brake on the centralization of power in the Federal Government?

Mr. HOBBS. If the gentleman will pardon me, I should like not to pass upon motives. I accept this veto at face value. I think the present great President of the United States has repeatedly shown himself sympathetic with the States. There never has been a man who has spoken more eloquently in defense of States' rights than the present occupant of the White House. [Applause.] I believe wholeheartedly that he means to be fair to the States. But, as Horace said, upon occasion even Homer hath been known to nod. This bill stands upon its own merit. It needs no defense and no defender. It ought to become law, notwithstanding the veto.

Mr. COX and Mr. WALTER rose.

Mr. HOBBS. It gives me pleasure to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman know of sufficient opposition in this House to this fair and reasonable proposal to justify delaying the opportunity for Members to express themselves?

Mr. HOBBS. No, sir; I know of none.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I am glad to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. I would like to call attention to the fact that at the time the hearings were conducted I asked the representative of the Attorney General this question:

> If I understand the Attorney General's position correctly, he would not be opposed to this bill if section II were out of it?
> Mr. HOLTZOFF. That is right.

The section II then referred to was taken out of the bill.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, just this one word in conclusion: This bill was amended in our committee to meet the views of every department of the Government so far as we knew them, and we beg of you, in the name of justice, in the name of statehood, in the name of that theory of States' rights which has been proclaimed in every lawbook in which there appears a Supreme Court decision on the subject, to proceed to pass this bill, and thereby give to the States the rights therein provided without further delay or argument.

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I am happy to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GWYNNE. As a matter of actual practice, has it not been demonstrated many times that the right of the States to intervene in these cases, under existing law and under existing court rules, is not protected and that this legislation is very much needed to protect the rights of the States in that respect?

Mr. HOBBS. I will say to the gentleman in answer to that question, that so far as my own personal experience goes, and I have been practicing in the courts for many years, I have no knowledge of any abuse of judicial discretion with regard to intervention. I cannot recall a denial of an application to appear amicus curiae when there was a showing made of a real interest to be so represented. But that militates not one whit against the necessity for this bill to become law.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. Again I am happy to yield to my esteemed colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. It has been suggested that the States might get into frivolous matters. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the same responsibility with respect to costs is imposed on the States as is imposed on other litigants?

Mr. HOBBS. I thank the gentleman; what he says is perfectly true.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the President's veto message on this subject may be read by the Clerk:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COOPER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the veto message, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, a bill entitled "An act to amend the Judicial Code by adding a new section thereto, designated as section 266a, to provide for intervention by States in certain cases involving the validity of the exercise of any power by the United States, or any agency thereof, or any officer or employee thereof, and for other purposes."

This bill would enable any State to intervene in and become a party to any suit or proceeding in any court of the United States, as a matter of right, whenever the validity of any Federal action is questioned, if (1) the determination of such question should involve any conflict with the exercise of any governmental power of such State, or (2) such Federal action would impair or abridge any governmental power asserted by or exercised by such State or any agency, officer, or employee thereof. In addition, it would impose on the courts of the United States, in every suit and proceeding now pending or hereafter instituted in which the validity of Federal action is questioned, the burden of ascertaining whether the determination of the question involves any conflict with the governmental power of any State and whether such Federal action would impair or abridge any governmental power asserted by or exercised by any State or any of its agencies, officers, or employees.

It was said (H. Rept. No. 1760, 76th Cong., 3d sess.) that this bill would give the States the same right to intervene to protect the constitutionality of their statutes as is given to the United States to intervene to protect the constitutionality of acts of Congress by the act of August 24, 1937 (ch. 754, sec. 1, 50 Stat. 751; U. S. C., title 28, sec. 401). However, the bill before me does not complement the 1937 act. It does not provide for intervention by the States in cases involving the constitutionality of State statutes affecting the public interest. On the contrary, it invites the States to intervene as a matter of right to attack the exercise of any Federal power impairing or abridging any governmental power asserted or exercised by the States or by any of their agencies, officers, or employees.

I find no justification for such broad powers of intervention by the States; particularly since the right of intervention given to the United States is limited to cases in which the constitutionality of an act of Congress affecting the public interest is questioned.

The district courts of the United States now have discretion to permit intervention by a State in any action in which the State's claim or defense has a question of law or of fact in common with such action (Rules of Civil Procedure, rule 24, following U. S. C., title 28, sec. 723c). The various administrative tribunals permit intervention by States upon a showing of interest in their proceedings. The Supreme Court permits the filing of briefs by States as amici curiae as a matter of right (Revised Rules of the Supreme Court, rule 27, par. 9). In my opinion, those provisions are adequate. No evidence has been presented of the inability of any State to defend the constitutionality of any of its statutes. The proposed statute would, however, subject a State's attorney general to pressure to intervene in any case where a private litigant is opposing Federal action, on the ground that such action invades States' rights. Such exploitation of the authority of State officials for the interests of private litigants should not be encouraged.

I fear that the judicial determination of the validity of the powers of the United States or their exercise would be hampered by the proposed broader powers of intervention by the States—powers of intervention not limited to cases in which the constitutionality of State statutes is questioned.

I am therefore compelled to veto the bill.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 10, 1940.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the telegram which I send to the clerk's desk may be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There being no objection, the clerk read the telegram, as follows:

RUTLAND, VT., June 14, 1940—12:39 p. m.

Hon. HATTON SUMNERS,
Chairman, House Judiciary Committee, Washington, D. C.:

Enactment of Satterfield bill is meritorious and essential to the preservation of our dual system of government. The States should be given the opportunity to present evidence and argument in all cases where the constitutionality of a State law is attacked. Only under such procedure can the courts be intelligently informed and the States be protected against usurpation of powers strictly within their sphere of government.

LAWRENCE C. JONES,
President, National Association of Attorneys General.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, if there is no further information desired by the Members of the House with reference to this bill, in view of the complete explanation that has been made of it, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House, on reconsideration, pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. Under the Constitution the vote must be taken by the yeas and nays.

The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 254, nays 46, not voting 131, as follows:

ELECTION TO A COMMITTEE

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 563

Resolved, That Charles Hawks, Jr., of Wisconsin be, and he is hereby elected to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent inasmuch as I objected to the consideration of the bill, H. R. 10213, this morning, that I be permitted to include the bill with my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REPEALING CERTAIN ACTS OF CONGRESS, POCKET VETOED—VETO MESSAGE

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 3233) entitled "An act to repeal certain acts of Congress (pocket vetoed)."

Your Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3233) entitled "An act to repeal certain acts of Congress (pocket vetoed)," together with the objections of the President thereto, having reconsidered said bill and the objections of the President thereto, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that said bill do pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of Members of the House I will be able to explain this resolution in a very short time. The resolution proposes to do just one thing. I believe there is a good deal of confusion about the scope of the resolution. The bill proposes the repeal of all pocket-vetoed bills. It proposes to do this in order to get those pocket-vetoed bills out of the picture, so that if the Supreme Court continues in the direction in which the members of the Committee on the Judiciary believe it is going and should hold that pocket-vetoed power not to be a constitutional power, not existing, the House bill would prevent some 600 bills that everybody has considered dead in this country from having any chance to become alive and confuse the country.

During our history these pocket-vetoed bills have accumulated. I assume that the Members of the House are familiar with what is meant by a pocket-vetoed bill. In the beginning, when we were following the precedent of the English practice, it was considered with us that all bills that were not completed at the end of each session were dead. As a result all bills were introduced at the beginning of each session. Under the British Constitution the Parliament was called into existence by a summons of the king, and was terminated by being prorogued by the king; but with us, we come into existence by the summons of the constitution and continue to operate as a vital agency of the Government until the expiration of 2 years. A good deal of confusion arose during those early years—29 years I believe—and it was not until 1848 that we had completely established the present practice of considering everything to remain vital and in status quo between the sessions.

As you know, when you come back here at the beginning of the second session, for instance, nobody could tell by looking in on the situation on the first day that you had been in recess or adjournment for more than 1 day. In other words, nothing happened during the interim. That we all know. We have straightened out everything except this pocket-veto matter.

The question of the constitutionality of this pocket-veto matter came before the Supreme Court 12 or 15 years ago. I want to explain the reason why we should do this. In that decision the Supreme Court held that there could be no return by the President, except to the House of origin when it was in formal session. That was the clear-cut decision by the Supreme Court in the first determination. A representative of the Committee on the Judiciary appeared as friend of the court in that case and insisted that there could be constructive delivery by the President to the House of origin when that House was not in session. The Court held against the position of the Committee on the Judiciary in that determination. A few years ago, in 1936 I believe it was, the Wright case came before the Supreme Court, bringing that question again to the Court. In that case there had been constructive delivery. The messenger from the White House arrived at the Senate when the Senate was in recess. The Senate being in recess, being the last day on which he could make the return, the return of delivery by the messenger of the President was made to the Secretary of the Senate. When the matter was presented to the Supreme Court, the Court held that that was a good return. In other words, they abandoned in part the position taken in the first determination, that there could be no constructive delivery.

The Supreme Court, in passing upon these questions, has held that there are two important things that are to be determined and that dominate. One is that the President shall have 10 days, Sunday excepted, in which to examine the legislation, formulate his objections, and make his return to the house of origin. Second, that the house of origin shall have the opportunity, speedily, to consider the President's objections. The practice of the pocket veto violates that arrangement, because it does make possible for the President, in effect, to kill an act of Congress without stating his reasons, and prevents the Congress speedily to consider the President's objections. As you all know, these pocket vetoed bills have to be reintroduced; you have to go through the whole procedure again; whereas if constructive delivery was permitted the house of origin could immediately, upon its convening, after the receipt of this message by the agents of the House, reconsider the bill and act upon it. We know that all of our bills are vital. They do not die. They are turned over to the Clerk of the House, and when we come back here we take them up.

I am not arguing the merits of the question of the pocket veto. I am stating the reasons why the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously reported this matter. That committee is not a partisan body. When we considered the decisions and attitude of the Supreme Court, we realized that there was sufficient probability that when the Supreme Court again considered that matter, properly presented, it might hold the pocket veto power not to be an existent power, and that if the Supreme Court did hold that, then there was danger of bringing back into the body of the country, the body of the law, and the whole situation, these possibly five or six hundred bills that everybody has considered as being dead.

Now, what do we propose to do? Just one thing. We propose to pass a bill which will make those bills certainly dead; make it impossible for those bills to be determined to be alive by reason of a change in the determination of the Supreme Court with regard to the pocket-veto power.

With all respect, I do not see how anybody can vote to leave this country open to the possible confusion of having five or six hundred bills suddenly brought to life some morning, when we can, by this act, remove the possibility of that confusion absolutely. That is all this bill proposes to do. It is something we ought to do. The Committee on the Judiciary is your agent. We went into this thing. We talked it over among ourselves, and not a member of the Committee on the Judiciary could discover any reason why we ought not to do it. The bill came to the House, and it was unanimously agreed to by the House. It went to the Senate, and the Senate Judiciary Committee unanimously agreed to a favorable report. It went to the Senate, and so far as I know, it was unanimously adopted by the Senate. I do not understand the reasons for this veto, but I am certain that in some sort of way there is confusion about the effect of this bill.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. As I understand the gentleman, to illustrate the point, if a bill passed 10 years ago, we will say, and there was a pocket veto, should the matter be brought into court and the court reverse its previous holdings and hold that a pocket veto was not effective, that bill might be revived and become a law, even though it had been regarded as dead during these 10 years.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; and there are between 500 and 600 bills that might thus rise to plague us.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. This bill is to preserve the status quo and let the situation stand as everybody understands it now is.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right. The purpose of this bill is to go as far as we can to make it certain that those bills will not come back if the Supreme Court should hold against the pocket-veto rule.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman state when and how this practice of the pocket veto originated?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; the practice of the pocket veto originated during those first 28 years when there was not anything else to be done according to the British precedents which we were then following. It had been held and practiced and believed in this country during those 28 years that all bills not finished died with the adjournment of a session of Congress. There was not anything else to be done about it under that construction but pocket veto the bills which had not been acted on by the President and had not been in his possession the 10 days.

Mr. HEALEY. Just one further question: Does the gentleman believe that the passage of this legislation, the President's veto notwithstanding, will have the effect of discouraging the practice of pocket vetoing bills in the future?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not want to involve the issue, but I do not hesitate to say to the gentleman that the plan of the Constitution is that the President shall state his reasons for vetoing any bill Congress enacts. Personally I hope the day will come in this country when that practice will be observed. That, however, is not directly involved in this case.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. There is no purpose so far as this bill is concerned, if the bill is accepted by the House and the Senate, to do away with the President's power to veto, if he has such power.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right. Let me emphasize that a little. It does not at all interfere with the President's power, and even should the Supreme Court hold, as we believe it is going to hold sooner or later, that the pocket-veto power does not exist, it would not interfere with the President's power of veto.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. One further question, if the gentleman will permit, about those 600 bills to which he refers affected by the pocket veto: The only purpose of this bill, as I understand it, is rather a nunc pro tunc action of the House, the effect being the same as if it had acted individually on each one of those bills pocket-vetoed and upheld the President.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We are doing our best to see to it that these killed bills stay dead. How can I state it any more clearly? Let me repeat it.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. And not let it go any further.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Not a bit. Let me repeat: What we are trying to do by this legislation is to see that these dead bills stay dead, that is all.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. PLUMLEY. In other words, if I understand it, this is equivalent to a final decree in the settlement of an estate. The patient is dead, buried, and the monument has been erected. Requiescat in pace.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The only thing about it is we feel we have got to hit him on the head once more to keep him dead, that is all. He is supposed to be dead and it is to the best interests of the country that he stays dead, but we feel we have got to crack him one on the head to be sure that he stays dead. That is what this bill proposes to do. If any of you do not agree with this theory, if you want to permit these 600 bills to come back and disturb the community and bring about a state of uncertainty, then you are not in agreement with the position of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. As a matter of fact, the passage of this bill is academic unless the Supreme Court should change its present ruling. If the Supreme Court does change its present ruling then this law would prevent those dead bills being vitalized by a Supreme Court decision.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I thank my colleague for that very clear statement. We are going as far as we can toward accomplishing that.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. As a matter of fact has the present President ever exercised the pocket-veto power? Has he not in all cases presented a message? That is my recollection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not recall, but I know he has not used the pocket veto frequently. Whether or not he has exercised the pocket veto at all I do not know.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BOREN. Does not this bill apply also to all future legislation affected by the pocket-veto procedure? Does not this bill abolish the pocket veto in the future at least in its practical effect?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; it does not. Just as my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan, explained, it goes as far as the Congress can go to prevent these pocket-vetoed bills from rising out of their grave to plague the country. Now, I cannot beat that statement.

Mr. BOREN. May I ask one further question: How can you determine which is the last session of Congress to which he is required to present a veto in writing within 10 days? Is this for a recess between the first and second sessions? If they call a special session after the regular session, what is the situation? It seems to me that the President's argument is worth considering.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I cannot tell what may be done in the future. All we can deal with is what we have dealt with. The Committee on the Judiciary has gone as far as it can to protect the country against the possible confusion of these bills being regarded as vital.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. As I understand it, the gentleman from Texas does not have any doubt about the right of the President to pocket-veto a bill at the end of a Congress—that is, at the end of the entire term.

With reference to bringing these dead laws to life, let me call attention to an instance clearly in point. About 1922 or 1923, possibly in 1920, the Congress passed a child-labor law for the District of Columbia. In 1923, or about that time, the Supreme Court of the United States held that law to be unconstitutional. About a year or two ago, the present Supreme Court passed on the same proposition and held it was constitutional. That revived that law. As I understand, that is the very situation the gentleman from Texas is trying to prevent; that is, a change in the opinion of the majority of the members of the Supreme Court. If they were to hold that the President did not have the right to pocket-veto a bill at the end of a session of Congress that was not the termination of the life of the Congress, then it would bring back to life all these laws that have been pocket-vetoed except these ones that were so vetoed after the final adjournment of the last session of a Congress.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I thank the gentleman. The Committee on the Judiciary is trying to render a good service to the House and to the country. Personally, I know of no reason that suggests itself to me why the bill ought to be opposed, except a confusion, possibly, as to the purposes of the bill.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The Committee on the Judiciary is to be congratulated on its foresight in doing this job. I am not clear about this, and let me ask this question, Has the Congress the constitutional right, can we pass a law that would be constitutional, which would in the future pass on this situation if it might arise?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; we could not do that.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. May I ask if the gentleman from Mississippi is correct in his position? Is that what you are driving at, that is, seeking to prevent the Supreme Court from reversing itself on the same law?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. You cannot prevent it from reversing itself, of course, but you can prevent, we hope, by this legislation, bills that have been considered dead being revitalized by a different decision of the Supreme Court. We believe that the Court will eventually hold that there may be constructive delivery of objected-to bills at any time during the life of the Congress.

Mr. LEAVY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. LEAVY. There is no Member of this House who has a higher regard and greater respect for the Committee on the Judiciary, of which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] is chairman, than I, but for 150 years we have gone along in the belief and on the theory that the pocket veto is valid. Twice the Supreme Court has passed on phases of that question, and in each instance they have so held. What reason does the gentleman have for believing that the present Supreme Court, as now constituted, would depart from the course of conduct that has run the life of the Nation and the precedent that has twice existed? It seems to me this legislation is a reflection upon the highest court of our land and that we seek to tie the hands of the Court and to express a lack of confidence in that Court.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman has used some very fine language and I appreciate it tremendously. If my friend will examine the two pocket-veto decisions by the Supreme Court he will find that in the first decision the Court held that delivery in every instance by the President has to be to the House in formal session at that time. The last decision by the Supreme Court held that that is not so; there can be a delivery by the President, constructive delivery, and in that particular case then under consideration the delivery was made to the Secretary of the Senate when the Senate was not in session.

In view of that decision and in view of the pronouncement of the Court itself in those two decisions, one of which upheld the right of the President at the expiration of the Congress to sign bills, I believe this bill should be passed and remove all uncertainty as to the status of these pocket-vetoed bills. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEAVY] is a good lawyer, and I will leave it to him. Let him read those two decisions and I believe he will come to the conclusion that the Court is headed as directly as it can move toward the thought that there can be constructive delivery at any time prior to the expiration of the Congress. Our bills are vital as long as the session of the Congress lasts. There seems to us no reason why the President should not make that delivery to the Clerk of the House or to the Secretary of the Senate.

I may say that the Committee on the Judiciary has gone into it very thoroughly and every single one of the 25 members is convinced, considering the direction in which the Supreme Court seems to be moving, that we do not have the right to sit here and take a chance on those five or six hundred bills being revived when by the passage of this act we go at least as far as we can go toward preventing that possibility of confusion. That is all we are doing by this bill. We are not reflecting on the Court or the President. We are not reflecting on anybody. We are just using good common sense and a little foresight. The Senate committee agrees with us.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I note in the language used by the President that he states as follows:

> The result of the interpretation which it is proposed by this legislation to place upon the pocket-veto power would be to render that authority practically nugatory and to effect by indirection an amendment to the Constitution.

I should like to have the gentleman's view upon that paragraph in the President's message.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will tell the gentleman what I think about it, although I sort of hesitate to speak about it. The President is a busy man. He cannot go into the details of preparing all these messages. I think somebody prepared the draft of that message who was confused as to the effect of the bill. That bill does not at all affect the constitutional power of the President, of course. How could it? I submit to the gentleman, who is a good lawyer. How could we by any act of this Congress affect the constitutional power of the President?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am not saying what I think. I have a very high regard for the gentleman's capacity to read statutes and the Constitution.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. You have to do it.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HANCOCK. This bill sustains and confirms all pocket vetoes heretofore made. Does the gentleman believe it will be necessary to pass similar bills in the future whenever bills receive pocket vetoes?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; but I do not believe there are going to be so many more of them.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. I am going to ask that the veto message itself be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas yield for that purpose?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read the veto message.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I object. We have all got copies of the message and have read it.

Mr. KELLER. I am going to take time so I can read it, although I would rather the Clerk would read it. He can do a better job than I can.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I appreciate the interest and attention you have given me. Your Committee on the Judiciary has done the best job it could to straighten out the situation.

Give me a copy of the veto message and I will read it. I had better read it.

Mr. KEEFE. Does the gentleman want it read?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, in view of the attitude of the chairman of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my objection, if it is necessary to have this message read. I had assumed that every Member of Congress had read this message. They have had an opportunity to read it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read the veto message.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the veto message as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning herewith, without my approval, the bill (H. R. 3233) entitled "To repeal certain acts of Congress (pocket-vetoed)."

I am constrained to pursue this course in view of the fact that an approval of the bill may have far-reaching implications in that it is based on an interpretation of the constitutional pocket-veto power of the President, which is much narrower than that which has been placed upon it by continuous usage for over a century, and which has met the express sanction of the Supreme Court. The acceptance of such new construction of the pocket-veto power would make a serious inroad on the pertinent constitutional provision. In fact, it would render the authority of the President to pocket-veto bills almost nugatory.

Article I, section 7, paragraph 2, of the Constitution provides that every bill that has passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall be presented to the President; that if he approves he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it with his objections to that House in which it shall have originated. It further provides that if any bill shall not be returned by the President within 10 days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

The failure of the President to act on a bill presented to him less than 10 days before adjournment of the Congress, thereby precluding such bill from becoming a law, has been denominated as a pocket veto. This authority has been frequently exercised at the end of various sessions of the Congress, without distinguishing whether or not such sessions were final sessions. It was first invoked over a century ago by President Madison, at the end of the first session of the Twelfth Congress.

I am informed that the total number of bills that have encountered a pocket veto aggregates over 600, of which almost half occurred following a sine die adjournment of a session as distinguished from a sine die adjournment of a Congress. A few years ago the Supreme Court in the so-called Pocket Veto case sustained the authority of the President to pocket-veto bills at the end of any session of the Congress. More recently, it has indicated that the President may return a bill with a veto message while the House in which the bill originated is in recess, clearly restricting its decision, however, to a recess occurring during a session of the Congress.

The bill under consideration proposes to repeal all bills that have been pocket-vetoed after any adjournment of a session of the Congress other than the final session of a Congress. Manifestly, such legislation would have far-reaching implications, because it would assume that all such bills became law and that the President has no authority to exercise a pocket veto at any time except after a final adjournment of a Congress. The result would be to place a limitation on the pocket-veto power which, in the light of long and continuous usage and the decisions of the Supreme Court, was not contemplated by the founding fathers.

Moreover, under the twentieth amendment, unlike the situation that previously existed, it is impossible to determine at the time of the adjournment of the second regular session of a Congress whether or not it is the final adjournment of the Congress.

The result of the interpretation which it is proposed by this legislation to place upon the pocket-veto power would be to render that authority practically nugatory and to effect by indirection an amendment to the Constitution.

If the bill under consideration were limited to the comparatively small number of bills that have been pocket-vetoed from time to time while the originating House was in a short recess during a session of the Congress, an entirely different question would be presented.

In its present form, however, the bill has far-reaching and undesirably implications which impel me to withhold my approval.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 11, 1940.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. With regard to the language you have just heard, I do not mean to criticize that message, but I make the statement that all of you will recognize that that would probably be a pertinent argument before the Supreme Court if the question pending before the Court were what it would do with reference to the next decision on this question; but to say that an act of the House and of the Senate getting these bills out of the way could have any effect on the constitutional powers of the President—well, I do not understand that myself.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BOREN. Is it not a fact that this bill nullifies any possibility for a pocket veto except on the final adjournment of Congress?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; we cannot nullify that.

Mr. BOREN. What need is there for passing this legislation in anticipation of a decision? Why can we not pass such legislation after the Court has made a decision?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We have passed it after we have had about 600 pocket vetoes.

Mr. BOREN. Yes; but has there been any such decision up to date that has put such veto bills into law? Why legislate in anticipation of possible Court decisions? Time enough after such decisions. In my opinion, this bill abolishes for once and all times the pocket veto, and we should not do this without more mature deliberation. This is the issue; the bill cleverly evades a direct attack.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. A few by the last decision. We are dealing with them, but we want to anticipate the possibility of the confusion that might arise if the mass of these bills should become vitalized.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Inasmuch as I am a member of the Judiciary Committee of the House of which the distinguished gentleman from Texas is chairman, and inasmuch as I voted to favorably report H. R. 3233, it is with reluctance at this time that I make these observations. These questions have arisen in my own mind and I feel that they are of sufficient consequence to call to the attention of the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee and other members here today.

If I have understood the gentleman, he takes the position that he anticipates that a decision of the Supreme Court in the future may vitalize more than 600 bills passed by the Congress and pocket-vetoed by the Presidents. In his typical and inimitable style he says in substance, "What we have all considered dead, we want to pass this bill to be sure they remain dead." In other words, anticipating a possible decision of the Supreme Court vitalizing bills which we have considered dead, it is argued that we should by this bill bring them to life in order to repeal them as of the date of their enactment. It seems that by this very bill, what we anticipate as a possible decision of the Supreme Court we, by legislation today, make a reality. You cannot repeal a nullity, you cannot repeal something that never had existence. So in order for us to repeal pocket-vetoed bills we must first give them validity. We must, by congressional action, which we do in this bill, bring them into actual existence. After doing this we say that such bills "are hereby repealed as of the date of the enactment."

By the language of the bill, therefore, we first vitalize these pocket-vetoed bills; we bring them into actual existence, which existence must date from their enactment, then repeal them as of the date of enactment. So far so good. Our action would seem harmless at first blush, but suppose that rights might have accrued under these pocket-veto bills which we bring into existence today by our action. Can we, by this bill, repeal such accrued rights so simply and easily as this bill attempts to do?

It might be said, and of course it will be said, that my position is far-fetched, that the rights that I speak of are wholly imaginary; but as a lawyer, it has been my experience and my observation that many law suits are started on imaginary rights. But before the litigation ends, such rights, to the dismay of litigants, have become very substantial. For more than 125 years we have gotten along fairly well under the pocket-veto procedure. I submit, is it worth while, in anticipation of what the Supreme Court might do, for us to arrive at the hurdle before the Court, and do the job which they might possibly do?

Notwithstanding the fact that it is exceedingly disagreeable for me after having voted for this bill when it was before us originally, and after listening to the typically able argument of our distinguished chairman to vote to sustain the President's veto, but I now feel that I must so vote.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It is rather difficult to answer my colleague, who has been all through these proceedings when we were arriving at conclusions. I thought it was understood in the committee that we did not know, and could not know, and nobody can know, what the Court is going to decide when it gets to this question again. We are trying to go as far as we can in order to avoid these bills becoming vital if the Court should hold against the pocket-veto power. The gentleman understands the difficulties that are involved in trying to have retroactive legislation. We have discussed that and, candidly, we do not know what can be done about it. All I can say to the gentleman is that we threshed that out thoroughly in the committee, and I thought he was present. I thought we arrived at the conclusion that the best thing to do was to pass this bill, and we passed it unanimously, and it passed the House unanimously, and it was reported by the Senate committee unanimously and passed the Senate unanimously.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. COOPER]. The question is, will the House, on reconsideration, agree to pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 185, nays 105, not voting 141, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, HAWAII, OVER MIDWAY ISLANDS AND OTHERS

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Concurrent Resolution 53, to extend the jurisdiction of the United States District Court, Territory of Hawaii, over the Midway Islands, Wake Island, Johnston Island, Sand Island, Kingman Reef, Kure Island, Baker Island, Howland Island, and Jarvis Island, and for other purposes, and pass the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 53, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 53

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in the enrollment of the bill (S. 1114) to extend the jurisdiction of the United States District Court, Territory of Hawaii, over the Midway Islands, Wake Island, Johnston Island, Sand Island, Kingman Reef, Kure Island, Baker Island, Howland Island, Jarvis Island, Canton Island, Enderbury Island, and for other purposes, to make the following changes, namely: On page 1, lines 7 and 8, of the engrossed bill, after "Howland Island", insert "and."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to extend the jurisdiction of the United States District Court, Territory of Hawaii, over the Midway Islands, Wake Island, Johnston Island, Sand Island, Kingman Reef, Kure Island, Baker Island, Howland Island, and Jarvis Island, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. What does this bill do.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, the House passed a bill the other day with a minor amendment, and there was a small grammatical imperfection in it and this concurrent resolution merely authorizes the Clerk to correct the title and insert the conjunction "and" in the aforesaid bill.

Mr. MICHENER. There is nothing to the bill except the word "and"?

Mr. KING. That is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The resolution was agreed to and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just voted upon and ask that those remarks, which will be just a paragraph, be inserted following the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], immediately preceding the vote upon the veto message.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. As I understand it, the gentleman wants to insert his remarks in the RECORD in a place other than where they were made in debate? That would be an unusual thing.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. The only thing I have in mind is this. I very briefly commented on the bill while the distinguished gentleman from Texas, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, had the floor. In order to clarify my own remarks, I am now asking to revise and extend them by inserting a brief paragraph immediately following the remarks of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MICHENER. Why cannot the gentleman extend his remarks at the point where he made them, with the consent of the gentleman from Texas? We do not want to establish a precedent here of permitting a man to come in after debate is over and insert an answer that was not actually made on the floor.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Michigan is correct, and I amend my request to conform to his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the amended request?

There was no objection.

COVERAGE OF CERTAIN PERSONS EMPLOYED IN COAL-MINING OPERATIONS

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4070) to provide for more uniform coverage of certain persons employed in coal-mining operations, with respect to insurance benefits provided for by certain Federal acts, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. What is the bill about?

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill from the Senate corresponding exactly with one reported unanimously by the House committee, taking out from under the effect of the railroad-retirement law, the unemployment-insurance law, and the Railroad Labor Act, miners who are employed by the railroad. Every one concerned is entirely satisfied, the miners, the railroads, and the railroad labor organizations.

Mr. MICHENER. Is this the situation, that the House committee reported a bill favorably. Was it unanimously reported?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes; I am right about that, am I not?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. CROSSER. I am sure it was unanimous.

Mr. MICHENER. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported this bill unanimously?

Mr. CROSSER. That is correct.

Mr. MICHENER. It is now on the calendar and the Senate has passed a similar bill?

Mr. CROSSER. Identically the same.

Mr. MICHENER. Now you want to pass the Senate bill unanimously, without consideration in the House?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. That would be a rather unusual precedent, if it is an important bill at all.

Mr. CROSSER. It is a bill that is purely technical in its nature.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand, this applies to miners who are employed in mines owned by railroads?

Mr. CROSSER. That is all.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. What kind of protection will they have if they are employees of railroads?

Mr. CROSSER. They want to come under the social security.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. You say they want to come under it?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman tells us that those representing the miners are satisfied?

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Lewis' organization was represented before our committee, and they are the ones who asked for the legislation.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. How about the miners themselves?

Mr. CROSSER. I understand the miners themselves wanted it. There was some man in Columbus who wrote me asking me to bring the matter up before the House.

Mr. MICHENER. But how about the other people, other than the miners?

Mr. CROSSER. Well, I think the railroad brotherhoods are agreeable to it. I know they are.

Mr. MICHENER. It does seem that a bill of this type should not be called up after we have presumably finished the legislative program of the day and many Members have gone.

Mr. CROSSER. There was no controversy before the committee about it at all. Everybody who was at all interested was thoroughly satisfied.

Mr. MICHENER. Of course, I do not know anything about it.

Mr. CROSSER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON] assured me it was all right.

Mr. MICHENER. Does this take a new class of people into the social security?

Mr. CROSSER. No. We simply take these different groups from under the operation of the railroad retirement law, the unemployment insurance law, and so on, and let them go with their own group, the miners. That is all.

Mr. MICHENER. Some members of the committee who are present do not know anything about this bill. In view of that situation, I wonder if the gentleman will not withhold his request for tonight?

Mr. CROSSER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON] is here. I yield to him to answer the gentleman.

Mr. MICHENER. It is very unusual to bring a bill up in this manner for consideration. If it is an important matter it certainly should not be brought up in this way, at this late hour, but, as I understand, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is for the bill.

Mr. WOLVERTON. That is true.

Mr. MICHENER. There is no opposition to it?

Mr. WOLVERTON. No.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman think it is a bill of such minor importance that it should be passed here without consideration?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I am of the opinion, in view of the unanimous favorable opinion of the committee, that it would be perfectly proper for the House to do so.

Mr. MICHENER. Was it on the Consent Calendar?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I do not know.

Mr. CROSSER. I do not think so.

Mr. MICHENER. If it was objected to, of course it should not be passed in this manner.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CROSSER. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. It has been some time since the Railroad Retirement Act was passed, 2 or 3 years, and rights have inured to different people. As I understand it, if a miner, worked in what we call a captive mine, a mine belonging to a railroad company, he would have had his status established—his right to participate in the railroad retirement fund. Now, if he has done that and has established a legal status, what effect will that have? I presume the gentleman has considered all that?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes. I do not know of any trouble about that. The Chairman of the Retirement Board says it is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, the hour is late. Few Members are on the floor. Many understood that no further legislation would come up today. The House will be in session tomorrow. If the bill is all right, it can be called up tomorrow. I am constrained to object for the present.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CROSSER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLER. I happen to have one of these mines in my district, and I know intimately the facts about it. Certain railroads own three or four large mines in the country under separate company names, but the railroads own them. All the miners are placed under social security by law. There never was any question about this until about a year ago when a railroad retirement lawyer raised the question about it and suspended the operation in favor of the miners being under the social-security law. So the miners, after waiting for some time, came down here, and I took the matter up with the Social Security Board, with the lawyers and with the Railroad Retirement Board, and they worked the thing out so that the miners go exactly where they belong, under the social security. To illustrate——

Mr. MICHENER. Now, just a moment. The gentleman has demonstrated that there is considerable to this bill, if only from a technical standpoint. I am probably in favor of it. I am not objecting to the bill, but I ask that the gentleman withdraw his request to pass it unanimously at this time.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I yield.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. I would like to say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] that when this bill was presented to the committee it was given very careful consideration as to the effect it would have upon those who come within the provision of the bill.

Mr. MICHENER. By a subcommittee or by the full committee?

Mr. CROSSER. By the full committee.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. We heard the parties affected and they were favorable to what is attempted to be done by this bill. We received the approval of all who would be affected by it. I do not know what further could be done than has already been done by the committee.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield,

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Was this bill approved by a unanimous vote of the committee reporting the bill?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. It was reported unanimously by our committee. When I say "unanimously," I could not say that every member was present.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. No; I mean by those members who were present.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. That is right.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. And it has been approved by the Social Security Board?

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. As well as by everybody affected.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. And it has been approved by the Railroad Retirement Board?

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. And the railroads that are affected?

Mr. SHORT. And the bill has passed the Senate.

Mr. CROSSER. The bill passed the Senate unanimously.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Evidently there is confusion. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to say that this provided for the transfer of certain minors who were eligible for benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act.

Mr. CROSSER. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That it placed them under the Social Security Act?

Mr. KELLER. That is where they belong under the law.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is this in substance an amendment to the Social Security Act which takes in a group of people not heretofore covered by that act?

Mr. KELLER. No.

Mr. CROSSER. No; it simply clarifies existing language. There is question as to whether or not these people employed by the railroads would come under the same ruling as railroad workers, it being developed that they are not railroad workers. It clarifies the law; that is all.

Mr. MICHENER. I must object, Mr. Speaker; there is too much confusion in the minds of some of the Members and too few Members here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan stated that this is an unusual way to bring up a bill of this sort. The Chair was advised that this bill came from the committee with a unanimous report. To have a bill brought in by the committee having jurisdiction when there is a unanimous report and considered in this way is not unusual, and the Chair recognizes gentlemen under those circumstances to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of bills. The Chair understands the gentleman from Michigan objects.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; I will withhold it.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, there is not any confusion that I know of in the mind of anybody who has made any study whatsoever of this bill. This is a unanimous action of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce after every precaution was taken to make certain and sure that it affected no one adversely, that it had no other effect than to clarify an uncertainty in existing law, and that it has the absolute approval of everyone who was to be affected by the change.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, the rules of procedure of the House provide for the reference of bills to committees, and the committee must arrive at a conclusion. This committee has arrived at a conclusion. The rules further provide that the House, after consideration, shall arrive at a conclusion. The gentleman goes on the premise, however, that if a committee or a subcommittee has arrived at a conclusion, that should settle the matter; that it is immaterial whether the rest of the House knows anything about it or not.

Other Members of the House, as suggested by the inquiries of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD], do not understand what the bill is. Not understanding it, they are opposed to it. If that is true, we should let the matter stand over until tomorrow, when all the Members will be here. I did not mean to say that the Speaker had done an improper thing in recognizing the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] for a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Michigan to object.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STARNES of Alabama (at the request of Mr. SPARKMAN), for 2 weeks, on account of official business—inspecting national defense.

To Mr. JACOBSEN (at the request of Mr. LECOMPTE), for August 5 and 6, on account of important business.

To Mr. MAHON (at the request of Mr. THOMASON), for 1 week, on account of important official business in connection with inspection of Army posts by Committee on Appropriations, of which he is a member.

To Mr. CHAPMAN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. SCRUGHAM, for 10 days, on account of official business.

To Mr. ROMJUE (at the request of Mr. NELSON), indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. TERRY, for 1 week, on account of official business requiring his absence.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] may have permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include some brief extracts from newspaper editorials.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address I delivered before the Vermont Legislature.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a recent editorial from the Daily Olympian.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two letters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Members who spoke on the bill S. 1379 may be permitted to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JOHNSON]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow after the regular order of business and after the disposition of special orders on the Speaker's desk I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to amend the extension I requested earlier in the day by the additional inclusion of a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an editorial from the Minneapolis Times-Tribune.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. YOUNGDAHL]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under a previous special order, the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] is recognized for 25 minutes.

CONSCRIPTION, A VOLUNTARY SYSTEM, YOUTH, AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the thing that every Member of the House is concerned with and thinking about is the question in reference to the so-called conscription or compulsory military-service bill. I am not going, this afternoon, to make a dogmatic speech on one side of that question, though I know what I would do if I had to vote today. I want all the time I can get and all the information I can get on this terribly important matter. Furthermore, it seems to me that with the events in the world moving as swiftly as they are it is impossible and perhaps wrong for any of us to fail to leave ourselves free to do that which is necessary at any given time from the standpoint of the welfare and need of the Nation. But there are one or two things concerning this matter on which I am quite clear in my own mind and which I think need to be said at the present time.

First, Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why at this very moment, tomorrow, or as soon as it can possibly be done there should not be legislation passed to raise the pay of the Army and to reduce the enlistment period to 1 year. I do not see why that cannot be done at once. I do not see why it should not be done anyway no matter what is going to happen to the other bill. I am of the opinion that it is of great importance to democracy that we try with all our hearts and souls to use the fundamental democratic method to meet this problem before we resort to peacetime conscription, which after all is going to be a long departure from the way that America has worked out her problems for a long, long time. In the opinion of many people who ought to know, this plan would bring volunteers into the Army as fast or faster than modern weapons for training or even camp facilities could be provided.

All of us are willing to do whatever is necessary to be done for national defense. But we want to do the thing that is best for national defense. We also want to preserve with all our strength those things which we seek to defend by means of the national-defense acts.

BASIC SAFEGUARDS

There are three principles which, at the very least, must be observed in any legislation of this character which may be passed. The first is that the size to which the Army is to be increased should be definitely set forth by the Congress in the legislation. As soon as we give that power up, it seems to me we have given up something of very great importance. The second is that legislation of this character—I mean a conscription bill—should never be passed in peacetime except under the greatest emergency and after all else fails; therefore it should be designed to meet that emergency and should not be a matter of permanent law. If it is to be a matter of permanent law, we ought to debate it for all day and all night for weeks, because it is that important as a turning point in America. The third point is that definite provision should be made so that after these men have had their year's training they cannot be called to active duty without action on the part of the Congress. I do not think I need to elaborate on the dangers of failing to insist on this. On those points I feel quite certain.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. PITTENGER. Does the gentleman know of any reason why opportunity for military training should not now be given to the boys in the C. C. C. camps who desire to take it, and why our National Guard armories should not now be used for young men in their own home towns for military training, without the necessity of taking them to the Army forts and other places?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I believe that a program of military training might well be worked out along lines of that kind. I presume the objection that will be made by certain people would be that it would take time to do it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman from Texas, the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. RAYBURN. Is not one of the great objections to giving military training in the C. C. C. camps that you certainly would create the impression, which would be a true one—since the boys from the poorer homes in the country are the ones who are in the C. C. C. camps, and nobody else—that you are going to the C. C. C. camps to get your army of your first line, and would be taking the boys from the poorest homes in the country?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I thank the gentleman, and I believe he is right about it.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PATRICK. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has acquainted himself, and I feel sure he has, with the percentage of those who present themselves for enlistment and yet cannot be received?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I am not sure of it. I do not know what the percentage is. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. PATRICK. I have read in an editorial in the Washington Post, I believe it was, that only 32 percent of those who present themselves pass muster. I may say that I am committed to the bill because I feel that it is the only solution, so I am a little biased on the subject, but I should like to ask the gentleman if he has studied the question, and I should like to hear him develop this point this evening if he will take the time to do it, if he does not believe that our present system of draft has a weakness in it in that it gets only those who are willing to volunteer, often, for example, such people as the so-called Okies, and does not include many who really ought to be in it and who ought to be given a part, whether or not "mama raised her boy to be a soldier." They ought to be prepared to do the things that are going to have to be done since we are expanding our armament to prepare to go forward with that program. I did not mean to take that much time, incidentally.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just one more comment?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. What am I supposed to do about this question?

Mr. PITTENGER. That was a speech.

Mr. PATRICK. No; it was a question. I am through.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Does the gentleman want me to comment on that?

Mr. PATRICK. I should like to get the gentleman's comment on whether we do not actually need that from this moment.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Need what?

Mr. PATRICK. A draft to expand the selection and give it more general application to those who go into the service.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I said in the beginning of my speech that I did not propose at this time to discuss this whole question, and I do not. My judgment is that we do not need conscription if we vigorously try to make a voluntary system work, and I am certainly for trying that first, for the adoption of military conscription at a time when we are not at war and as a matter of national policy may be fraught with the most serious consequences. It should be a last resort if it is done. I am not sure at this moment whether or not we do need that. I recognize the fact that it has been people from the ranks of the unemployed to a great extent who have volunteered in recent years, and I think it is a very significant fact at this moment, when we are beginning to be interested in the Army, that that should be true. I should like to call it to the attention of a lot of people who have been very critical of the unemployed and said that they were unwilling to work, ought to look harder for a job, or do this, that, or the other. But we now find that it is they who have in large numbers volunteered for the Army. I think we should give them credit for that. Answering more directly the gentleman's question, I think there are values to be lost both ways. I believe this burden ought to be shared equally by all groups, but if the pay is raised, and if further opportunities for special training and promotion are offered, I believe you will get volunteers from all groups, and I think that when you depart from the method of an appeal to your people to do the thing that is important to be done for their country and resort to the method of compulsion, something has been lost. Maybe you have to do it. If you do, I think you have lost something very valuable.

Mr. PITTENGER rose.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I have several things here that I very much want to get into this speech. I wonder if I may be permitted to proceed.

EQUALITY OF SACRIFICE

We have spoken many times about equality of sacrifice. I think it is most important that we scrupulously should observe that. As long as the American people believe that the sacrifices they are asked to make are paralleled by equivalent sacrifices on the part of others, they will not complain. To date, as far as I know, there has been no complaint from the little fellows on whom the principal burden of additional taxes recently voted largely falls. This is in spite of the fact that we have not as yet taken action to pass legislation which would effectively take the profit out of war, if it should come, or to levy against inheritances and idle accumulations, as I believe we should. The excuse for a bill to conscript men ought certainly to be one of required equivalent sacrifices from all elements in the national-defense picture.

Some time ago I was informed that a number of manufacturers had told the National Defense Council that unless they were allowed a 12-percent profit over and above—not cost—but contract price, they would not be able to cooperate in the defense program. I was at that time inclined to doubt that that was true. However, in the $5,000,000,000 appropriation bill which we recently passed, there was a provision, as we now know, raising the profits on aircraft contracts to 12 percent, although only a few weeks previously Congress had reduced the limit to 8 percent. I assume this was done because it was found that it was necessary to do that in order to get these contracts accepted. I also find that the Bureau of Internal Revenue has ruled that whenever a new plant is constructed on leased land, the entire cost of the plant can be amortized over a 5-year period, which practically means that a deduction for income-tax purposes equal to 20 percent of the total cost of the new plant can be made each year.

Mr. KELLER. Where does the gentleman get that?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I have gotten it from a number of different sources, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLER. I would like to get it.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. What happens, I wonder, under these circumstances, to the effectiveness of the proposed tax measures which we are told will be accompanied by a complete removal of all limitations of any sort on profits?

I am not saying that adequate defense is not worth almost anything that we may have to do to get it. But I am saying that against this sort of background the people are going to wonder what the essential difference is between the announced necessity for conscripting men on the ground that they have not volunteered and the apparent willingness on the part of government to give to industry almost anything it asks with no thought whatsoever about the equal justification for drafting the services of plants on precisely the same ground that it is proposed to conscript men.

If the voluntary system can be said to have failed in inducing men to enlist in the Army at $21 a month and possibly to give their lives for their country, then it certainly can be said to have so far failed in securing cooperation from industry at a cost that is fair to the American people.

So I think that this thing should work at least in the manner of even-handed justice, and if men are to be drafted on the ground that an emergency exists then industry and finance should also be drafted for the same reason, and on the same basis.

ABOUT YOUTH

In the last few years we have had a number of people out of work. Approximately 4,000,000 of those people have been the youth of America. I have had them come to me; I have had them write to me and the one thing they wanted most was a job, a chance to help to build constructively their Nation's life. It seems to me that any program that is adopted in this period has got to be not simply a reaching out on the part of the Nation for the services which it has a right to ask from all of us, but that it must also be a program which takes into account the fundamental needs of the young people of America and regards them as what they truly are, the greatest resource this Nation has any place.

So I want to make a proposal this afternoon, and I hope I have the time, as it will not take me very long.

The ideal of the Nation asking a year of my life, your life, or anybody else's life to be given in its constructive service seems to me a very good ideal. I think we might find a way to do that, but I am certain we must work out that way with the utmost care and with a thought not only to the Nation's needs, but the needs of these young people as well.

The American Youth Commission, of which Mr. Owen D. Young is chairman, had the following to say in its book of recommendations entitled "Youth, Defense, and the National Welfare":

> One of the saddest aspects of the present situation is the number of people who are giving highly vocal support to conscription for the purpose of defending democracy, but whose attitude toward social reform is one only of contempt. These are the people who have not yet learned that democracy will not be aided, and that the salvation of this country will not be advanced by the conscription of life that is underprivileged and unhopeful. This country can only be defended enthusiastically by people who expect just treatment from it.

May I say as an aside that we can take a lesson from the example of the French people. With their Maginot Line, the greatest fortification in all the world, the thing, apparently, that was lacking in addition to modern weapons for the Army was a spirit among the people, a spirit that you cannot buy, a spirit that you cannot compel, a spirit that you can only appeal to and cultivate and build up through the knowledge and the belief of the people that those who are in position of responsibility in their Government seek nothing so much as their welfare and justice to them. Dictators were successful in European countries not because those nations lacked armed forces but mainly because their internal economic situation had become static. I believe it is altogether possible to strike a blow against this danger, to offer to youth the forms of opportunity which it by nature craves, and also that would fulfill the defense needs of the Nation. I believe we can have a program which would be based upon the sincere desire of our people to see a better America, a program which will capture the imagination of youth, one which would gain widespread popular support, one which will build morale.

I agree that we have emphasized far too much all through American history the opportunity which this country afforded to people to take from it for themselves. I agree that we have neglected making emphasis on what all of us can give to the Nation. The basic principle of service to the Nation is fundamental to our life. To put that principle into practice it is necessary that care be taken to include one vital factor, that of the spirit and the morale of the people who perform the service. Millions of Americans have for years been urging and asking for just one thing, namely, an opportunity to work, and millions of these have been among our young people. To offer them now simply a bald program of military conscription would seem to me a great mistake. I think we can do much better than that. Suppose we set up a Government service office in every city in the land and send out word that there are tasks to be done—tasks in training one's self in aviation, mastering specialized mechanics, preserving the public health, conserving the resources of the Nation, and service in the armed forces of the Nation. I challenge you to offer to the youth of America a real opportunity to enroll for a year for one of these types of work—and who will say that one is more important than another—and I predict that if this were done the youth of America would storm those places to enroll their names. I am convinced that our people are not afraid of service or unwilling to make sacrifices for America, but I am just as firmly convinced that they want to know that they are making a sacrifice for objectives and ideals that represent all that is best and finest in our American way of life. I think we should set to work on legislation that would provide for the enrollment of our young men when they reach the age of 18, or possibly 19, for 1 year of constructive service to the Nation.

We should provide, as far as possible, for the use of existing facilities and reduce to a minimum the administrative machinery needed to carry out the program of universal service to the Nation by our young men, and there should be certainly opportunity for older men to volunteer for such service. Registrants should have the opportunity of giving their year's service at any period most satisfactory to them from their eighteenth to their twenty-fourth year. Thus life plans need not be too seriously interrupted, and there would also be a choice of the type of service to be performed, within the limit set up by legislation of the maximum number that could be cared for in each field affected. There would be opportunity to enroll in the Civilian Conservation Corps, to work with the Public Health Service in rural communities or in underprivileged areas in urban centers, to enlist in the Coast Guard, and to work and take training under the National Youth Administration, to take training for aviation either as pilot or mechanic and in the vitally important task of soil conservation and work of that sort. I expect there are other types of work I have not mentioned. Then finally they could enlist in the armed forces of the United States. The pay would, of course, have to be small, because the fundamental idea would be service to the Nation. I would pay to the other groups somewhat less than I would give to those enlisting in the armed forces, because after all they would be the ones who might be asked to give the most. I believe under the program of this kind the Army would get the men it needs. Not only would that be true, but it would be true also that men would be learning other things as vital to national defense as military training. It would be true that the idea of universal service to the Nation would be combined with the opportunity of young people for development. Also it would teach patriotism. There would have to be a top limit set for the number that could enroll for each type of work, of course, and there would have to be discipline and no malingering in any service group, just as has been true, for example, in the C. C. C. All would give their year's service on an equal basis.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Under the gentleman's proposed voluntary service I think there is a great deal of merit because we would have a finer spirit in the service. Would you not also include a provision so that these multimillionaire warmongers who are advocating compulsory military service can divest themselves of some of their millions voluntarily and give their wealth to help pay for the cost of this defense program, particularly in view of the almost bankrupt condition of our Federal Treasury?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I think that has to go along with it. I hope the new tax bill will take care of that angle of it.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. If we have compulsory military service, as provided in the Col. Adolph Ochs Adler New Deal bill, to draft people up to the age of 65, why should the Members of Congress be exempt? Why should they not be included specifically, so that all Members of Congress up to 65 years of age can serve in Uncle Sam's Army for $21 a month immediately after the enactment of the bill for which they vote?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I do not think the Members of Congress should be exempt. I think that is wrong. I certainly would support or offer an amendment myself to take such an exemption out of the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. If we have compulsory military service to draft manpower to do the fighting, in view of the almost bankrupt condition of our Federal Treasury, should we not draft wealth in order to pay for the cost of preparation for war and future wars?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Certainly. That has been the whole burden of my speech this afternoon. I would point out to the gentleman that that is the main point I have been trying to make, and I hope I have. I am going to be deeply interested in the tax bill that will come in. I think it is most important, from the standpoint of the spirit of the people that I have been talking about, that it should be a genuine measure.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. In view of the gentleman's reference a short time back in his speech—and it is a very good speech, incidentally—to the fact that Congress has seen fit to increase the percentage with reference to the profits to 12½ percent, evidently as an incentive in producing strategic war supplies, does the gentleman feel that if the Congress saw fit to raise the pay of the armed forces of the United States, and possibly reduce the present enlistment period from 3 years to 1 year, that such a move might make it unnecessary to enter upon the conscription plan?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. At the beginning of my speech this afternoon, I said exactly that. I said I believed that such legislation should be passed immediately, and that certainly before we go to something else, the most earnest effort should be made to make that successful.

In conclusion, I would like to say in connection with this proposal that this program of national service would be directed, from the standpoint of general policy, by a national advisory commission of 7 to 15 outstanding men and women representing not only the Army and Navy, but the important educational, religious, cultural, labor, and industrial groups in the Nation. It would be their responsibility to see that the idealism of youth was directed toward the problem of a better America. They would have a weighty responsibility, but I am certain, gentlemen, that in this great land men and women of the caliber we would want to direct such a program would willingly make real sacrifices to participate in it because of the real opportunities for national service and international good will it offers.

May I summarize by saying that as we view this problem of national defense, as we view this problem of the critical period in our country's history, perhaps the greatest one of all, there are certain things we have to bear in mind. The first and fundamental one is the spirit and morale of the American people——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GORE). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 5 minutes, but the Chair understands that under a previous order of the House the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] has a special order. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield for the unanimous consent request of the gentleman?

Mr. KELLER. I yield whatever time the gentleman needs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the gentleman, and as usual the gentleman is facing the problems that are presented to him by his office with the sincerity that has attached to all his efforts and work as a Member of Congress.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HEALEY. I was wondering if, in the plan that was submitted by the gentleman, there would not be a great attempt on the part of those who would ordinarily be subject to military service, who by reason of physical fitness and that sort of thing would naturally be subject to military service, to try to get some of the other types of work which the gentleman has mentioned, rather than to submit to military service?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. You understand under this plan everyone would give a year. Everyone would give 1 year. I am inclined to believe that under those circumstances, particularly with an increase in Army pay and if a little more credit were given to the boy who did enlist in the Army, than has been given to him, and a little more effort made to show that he was doing something patriotic and not something as a last resort because he could not get a job, you would get as many men as would be needed for training in the Army.

The second thing I started to say in the closing remarks I attempted to make a moment ago was that you must bear in mind if you desire a balanced program that true national defense implies that you will have people trained to do the kind of jobs that your Nation needs to have done. It implies further that you must have people able to fly airplanes, that you must have people able to service airplanes, that you must have people able to take care of the sort of thing that has come into the picture so much in connection with the wars that have been fought in Europe, and that you must meanwhile conserve all the resources of your Nation—both human, natural, and industrial.

A third thing I believe to be important is that we must do those things necessary for defense, but as we do those things we must remember that we tread a narrow path between defense on the one hand and the keeping intact of the fundamentals of American life upon the other. Let it never be said that this Congress when it was asked to do—and readily did—so much for national defense, permitted the taking away of the fundamental rights of the American people or permitted an encroachment upon the well-being of the common man on the part of those more powerful than he. These are the things we must watch out for. It will, I am afraid, be a hard task in the months that lie ahead. But the future of our country depends on our doing it.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I have finished, but I yield.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Does not the gentleman realize that there have always been fundamental rights in this country, one of which is not to have one's property taken without due process of law except in time of war? One right enjoyed by the individual is to be employed, to engage in business, a right that cannot be infringed unless the country actually is in a state of war.

I believe that any such plan as the gentleman proposes is virtually the same as what they have in Germany. Indeed, many of our German citizens came here to escape from such a system.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I hope the gentlewoman understands the proposal I have made. I am afraid she does not, or else does not understand what was the policy and situation in Germany. If she understood she would realize immediately that what I propose could not be related to or compared with the German system. What I propose has one very definite purpose—to develop conditions which would prevent opportunities for the establishment in this country of the German system. The proposal I made is a proposal in lieu of a bald draft bill. It would, I am convinced, meet the needs of our Nation; it would also meet the needs of our young people. No doubt it can be worked out much better than I have done it in this brief speech. It would be under the direction of groups of citizens in the different communities. It is true the idea would be for everybody to give 1 year of constructive service to his country, during which time there would be opportunity to build his health and his strength. And so far as taking anyone's property without due process is concerned, my only point was that I believe people are at least as important as property and that the two should be treated alike.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Why not do it by the system of private enterprise? As we go down the street here we see numerous advertisements of the F. H. A., the U. S. H. A., the A. A. A., the W. P. A., and every department of Government. All you see for the Army or the Navy are the same old signs that have been there since 1920. Why not advertise these departments at least as much as the other departments not nearly so necessary at present?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I can answer that by saying that people engage in free enterprise because it is profitable. The work of soil conservation, or of the Army, or of training for aviation, or of public health, or of any of the other things I have suggested is not profitable. It is public service.

In the second place, I may say to the gentlewoman from Illinois that any time private enterprise will provide jobs for these unemployed, I shall be very happy and our task here will be far easier. I have proposed over and over measures which I believe would help industry to do that. The essential thing is for it to have a market for its goods.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I am saying that you should appeal to their sense of profit. Tell them that as enlisted soldiers they will receive a decent wage. Appeal to people who have no jobs at all. Tell them how the Government will take care of their wives and their children and will furnish them with insurance, hospitalization, and other inducements. Tell them we do not intend to go into a war, but all we want is an army that will protect us and be so strong that no one will attack us. That, therefore, they shall be reasonably safe. That is the whole purpose of the proposed Army. That is a point those who are for conscription in peacetime are overlooking.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] is recognized for 1 hour.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, idealistic as is the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS], a gentleman with many of whose ideas I so heartily agree, I feel he has made a mistake in judgment with regard to the Maginot line when he stated that it was the morale of the French Army which caused its defeat. That is an entire mistake. The truth of the matter is it was the German tanks with cannon in front, and machine guns on the sides, and devices to throw flames 100 feet—thousands of them, not a few thousand of them—that defeated the French Army. Flesh and blood could not stand up against such monsters, that is all. The French Army was the finest army in the world armed in an old-fashioned, out-moded way. It could not resist those tanks; and it is that phase of this whole matter that I wish to discuss. I want to point out from a rather wide experience and observation along this line, the things we are really facing at the present moment, to make a practical matter out of this preparedness business. It is an inquisitive study of the whole question, including a comparison of the question of conscription and volunteering.

I am glad the President of the United States, in view of the full information he had, has awakened the American people to the very real dangers which beset us. If he had not presented the matter to us in the powerful and dramatic way which he did, I doubt whether we would yet understand, appreciate, or be at all upon the road to preparedness as we are. I am glad he was willing to take the criticism leveled at him on the charge of "intemperate language." It was the only way of awakening us to the preparedness necessary to keep us out of war.

No one deplores war more than I do. No one can sympathize more deeply with the men who must carry on war, and still more deeply do I sympathize with the women and children who suffer most from war. But careful reading of history has impressed upon me indelibly the service which armies have rendered to these same women and children against the attackers of countries and the destroyers of the development of civilization of many peoples throughout all times.

An instructive book could well be written on the service which armies have rendered to women and children of the world, the men of the world, and the civilization of the world. The theory that all war is wrong on both sides has been thoroughly exploded. There is the aggressor and the defender: The invaders of the countries of men and the defenders of those countries. The deniers of liberty, the destroyers of liberty, and the defenders of it have been thoroughly exemplified in our own country.

From the beginning of time men have made war on each other. At each new development of means of attack, the other side has been required either to nullify the effect of the improvement by copying it, or to provide means of defense against the improvement.

After hand to hand combat, the first arm was a club. Then rocks. Then stone battle-axes. A sharper cutting edge was attained by using bronze, then iron, then steel in making javelins, daggers, and swords. Finally, bows and arrows increased the range. The use of like weapons and shields was the defense against these weapons.

Horses were then used to ride down the foot soldiers of an opposing army who were not fleet enough of foot to get out of the way. In the Orient the elephant was used to break the opposing army and it was the striking power of the elephant army that brought victory over a long period. The cry of "The elephants are coming" warned of defeat and flight until some genius discovered a means of stampeding the elephants. The chariots with scythes won many a battle in the Near East till a method of stampeding the horses drawing them was discovered. Each time some new arm was made effective it brought victory to the side that invented it and used it.

The organization of armies steadily improved. The Greek phalanx especially taught the world that mass formation with swords, javelins, battle-axes, and shields could overcome any army not so equipped and handled. The idea of mass movement of armies was used by Genghis Khan to the astonishment of the armed forces of the world of his time.

Finally, in the Middle Ages, personal armament was brought to such a point that the protection of the individual wearing it was practically perfect against the swords, battle-axes, and spears of the time. Machiavelli, in his history of Florence, cites a battle between two professional armies equipped with armor which raged all day without a single man being killed.

But the use of firearms rendered the heavy armor useless. It was a new striking force which brought to the armies of the world new victories. The clumsiness of the armor served only to hamper the soldier in his attempt to escape the firearms.

The development of small cannon preceded that of the musket. Because of the difficulty of transporting them they were put on wheels. The advantage of rapid movement of armies brought the light arms, the musket, and rifle. Napoleon found ready for use when he came into command an improved musket and a new mobile cannon more effective than any previous one. And by refusing to fight in accordance with the accepted traditional rules of war he beat all of the opposing armies of Europe. He used the surprise attack on the unexpecting and therefore the unprepared armies of his opponents. Half the striking power of any army depends on this question of speed.

The development of the arms and equipment during the World War had permitted the stabilization of lines because all the armies engaged in that war finally had practically the same arms, the same equipment, the same organization, nearly equal numbers of effectives on each side, and the same ideas of using them. So the World War was a military stalemate.

So we have passing before us the foot soldier, the cavalry, the chariot, the camel, the elephant, the pack mule, the wagon, the flatboat, the steamboats, the railroad, and the automobile in the endless unraveling of time which extended tremendously the opportunity to use the inventions in arms.

But around the arms available for war have invariably circled the changes in borders of states, in dynasties, in the living conditions of people, in the destruction or defense of homes, in the retention or loss of liberties. Governments have been forced to depend upon arms, armament, and armies for their existence; or, lacking these, they have faded from the pictures of history. So it has been, so it is, so it will be, so long as the law of force exists in the hearts of even the few who shall have direction of any large part of mankind. Therefore, the rest, the lovers of peace and justice, must be the able and willing defenders of humanity if democratic government is to continue to bless mankind. Any lack of courage, any lack of willingness to go forward, any hesitancy to meet and defend against aggressor nations will only encourage attack, and lead others to rise to destroy democratic governments—to rob and enslave peoples.

We are living in an age in which every invention for attacking peace-loving peoples are available to any aggressor government as well as to the people who invented them. There are few secrets retained by any nation. But there is no country, or combination of countries, with better or greater resources than our own for meeting and surpassing any and all arms, equipment, and armament available to any possible adversary.

Aggressor governments understand only one thing—force. No individual bully ever attacks anyone whom he is not sure he can beat up. No aggressor government ever attacks another country unless it feels sure of success. Properly prepared, we can be sure no attack will be made. That is our only—but our sufficient—guarantee of peace. Let us, therefore, not hesitate to prepare to the fullest extent.

We are facing a condition which possibly only once in history has confronted the countries which aspire to liberty. Within 4 months of actual warfare six free countries with a total population of more than 110,000,000 people have been blotted out. This is exclusive of the millions of colonists of the governments that have been crushed whose liberties are also lost. Five of these six countries, with 70,000,000 of these people, had committed no slightest offense, and had remained strictly neutral, and had every assurance against any possible aggression up to the very day they were invaded.

The Napoleonic wars were by no means comparable to this terrific onslaught. He led only one strong nation against which all the rest combined. This present holocaust has the full cooperation of two great nations in Europe directly denouncing democracy and seeking to destroy it, and the passive cooperation of the populous and powerful Russian people; in the Orient a cooperative totalitarian government, taking every advantage of the difficulties of the defeated European countries and using the same threatening tactics which characterize its totalitarian associates in Europe, and the same heartless destruction of peoples—of peoples in their case of older and better civilization than their own, but who committed the offense of loving peace too much.

There is only one case in history at all comparable to the present combination of totalitarian governments of this present ominous day. This is the great outpouring of a prolific people of a country of the enormous population of hundreds of millions of souls. They continued to send forth in the footsteps of their great leader—the increase in that population flowing resistlessly westward year after year along the old trade routes of Asia to the very shores of the Mediterranean. Each successive wave of recruits made more than invincible the great hordes of Genghis Khan.

The story of his endless victories, of the terror of his armies, did not apply alone to the countries through which he passed and whose armies he destroyed, but countries far and near, from the very terror which his armies inspired, rushed to him to make peace in advance by surrendering to him and begging to be made a part of his empire—just as southeast Europe is rushing to Hitler to prevent destruction today.

I call attention to this story of Genghis Khan not only because of the similarity of the terror of his armies and Hitler's armies but more to call attention to the then world-wide results of the invasions and destructions of governments and peoples of the century which followed them. The student will find in the succeeding period most impressive suggestions of what we may reasonably expect from the victories already achieved by Hitler's armies, socially, economically, and spiritually. And if his victories should be extended, as in all probability they may be, the effects for years to come on every so-called civilized country far and near will compel the most careful consideration by every people everywhere, for all will be affected very certainly and very directly, including our own America, even though we never participate in any war activities, which we shall not do if we prepare against attack as we are now setting out to do.

It now becomes necessary to inquire carefully into what has actually happened—what means were employed to bring it about—how these means were provided, why one side had all the implements of victory and the other none worth speaking of. Therein we should seek intelligently our own instructions. But if we are to profit by this investigation, it must be entered into without prejudice, without sentiment, but with our minds set on obtaining the bald facts alone.

Let us see for a moment just what was the condition which immediately preceded the present chaos in Europe. For years, Britain had had as thoroughly a businessman's government as any nation can have. The businessman's government looked out for British investments abroad—in Spain, in Italy, in Russia, in Germany—in every country on earth where profits were available. British manufacturers sold large amounts of the war munitions to whomever would buy them including Germany, that were intended by the Germans to be used against the British Government. The whole Chamberlain policy of appeasement was the policy to protect profits, because profits is the ultimate and dominant object of all business, and the guiding star of all super-businessmen.

The profits from foreign investments have for long periods been little less the interest of French investors.

The French Army was undoubtedly the best army in the world. It conceived and built the Maginot Line, pronounced it impregnable and went to sleep behind it. But depending on the sanctity of governments, they left exposed the Heel of Achilles, the Sedan sector, even though it was through that very region which France had been invaded in 1870 and 1914. And, against the arms, armament and equipment available at the end of the World War, the Maginot Line might have been impregnable.

The Germans built their west wall which was impregnable against the splendid French Army with its 1918 equipment. But, behind that wall an idea had been born—a new idea as old as time. It accepted the fact that unprotected flesh and blood cannot withstand steel and ball and flame.

At the end of the World War, Germany had no army. At the beginning of his influence, Hitler had no army. He called upon the machinists of Germany.

He took the three American inventions, the submarine, the tank, and the airplane. He did not build a few of them for experimental purposes. He took what had already been done. The Bohemians had built the best tanks up to that time. He built not a few tanks, but thousands of tanks. He provided motorcycles for soldiers, machine guns on wheels were built for two men. To these tanks he adapted always larger and larger cannon. In the largest he added flame throwers and antiaircraft guns. He built tanks that weighed a hundred tons.

He built not three or four thousands of planes as other countries were thinking about, but built probably not less than 20,000 planes.

This was not done in a day, but throughout the past 6 years. He made no new inventions. He did not build as good airplanes as we built nor as the English, for that matter. But, where the English built one he built five. He did not have time or opportunity to develop the individual fighting capacity of the pilots, as did the English, but he made his men quickly able to fly an airplane and obey the commander of the squadron.

A few were well-trained fighters and these were used as the commanders. But the whole idea was from the beginning to overwhelm with striking force any army that should lie before these mechanized forces.

The men in the newer tanks were protected against outside attack to a remarkable degree. He did not desire or did not think it necessary, apparently, to protect all of his soldiers as he might have done, and as we must do in coming wars.

The wars of the hereafter, into which America may be forced, will be war in which every individual in the Army will be protected to the fullest extent against the attacking forces.

Hitler still used the German idea of mass attacks. But, his mass attacks were with tanks and airplanes coordinated to a remarkable degree.

It was simply out of the question for the French Army with their old equipment to withstand such attacks as he delivered with such tremendous speed and power. In 6 weeks he literally ran over the little Dutch Army and the large Belgian Army, with their British and French help, and whipped and took full charge of the north half of France. He compelled France to accept what appears to be nothing less than national surrender.

If our American officers will look out with wide-open eyes at what has really happened to the great French Army, surely they ought to be able to see how pitifully weak our own Regular Army is at the present time and how much weaker still is our National Guard with the .30 caliber rifles.

The one tank division which we now have, weakly equipped as it is, is a better striking force than all of the rest of the present Army put together.

And let me here call attention to the fact that so far as we have tank equipment that it is due much more to a Member of Congress, the Honorable ROSS COLLINS, of Mississippi, than to any Army officer or all Army officers put together.

I am not underestimating when I say that if every man in the Regular Army with a .30 caliber rifle were put out on the fighting line against a half dozen tanks equipped as the German tanks were, they would be defeated in short order.

We have to understand that the importance of the different divisions as originally established and that especially of the Infantry, is a thing of the past. In the Civil War and even in the World War, the Infantry was the backbone of the Army. I heard my father, a Civil War veteran, say "Artillery to make the noise, cavalry to make the show, and infantry to do the fighting." That was true in the Civil War, that was partly true in the World War, but it is absolutely not true today. Infantrymen with .30 caliber rifles are useless today except only to mop up an already defeated enemy and to hold conquered territory.

The personnel of armies and navies have never been noted for their inventions of new equipment. It has been the task of the officers of all armed forces to learn to use the inventions which have been placed in their hands.

Of course, the professional soldiers of the world ought to have seen that new equipment and improved equipment might again change the methods of attack and defense, and thereby endanger every line that depended on the old and outmoded armament. But the professional mind did not perceive any such simple conviction though the history of the development of arms and armament pointed the way clearly to that conclusion and gave the warning to an observing mind.

The professional mind poured into an academic groove and held there through years of discipline has little enough encouragement to strike out along new lines and must not be blamed too much. That is not the province of the professional mind as we know it. The new departures along all lines have come from minds that have been left free to think, often without the knowledge of what had been done before. The great and growing exception to this rule lies in the appreciation of the laws of science, resulting in the scientific research which fortunately is one of the great achievements of our generation.

The man who has not had thorough personal experience in operating tanks under all the conditions which their use in warfare may entail has little call to direct an army whose principal striking force lies in those fighting machines. No theoretical student of Army practices should presume to command tanks and airplanes until he learns by his own experience how to use them.

Our Army as at present equipped is totally inadequate. But if the 252,000 men now in the Regular Army were equipped with tanks, and armored busses for transporting men to scenes of action, with fighting airplanes guarding them overhead as they can be, they would be superior to any million men as at present armed and equipped.

The speed of the "blitzkrieg" of Hitler with the terrific speed and awful driving force paralyzed the armies made up of 6,000,000 men—thoroughly drilled, thoroughly equipped in the old way. If the General Staff of the American Army does not awaken completely and entirely to what Hitler's machinists accomplished, we shall fail in our preparedness program, or the Congress will be compelled to turn that question over to men who know machinery.

An army with striking power is quite as effective in defense as it is in attack. Our Army is to be the defending army. We must take full advantage of what innovations Hitler has certainly made. We must look out for and accept new inventions that will put us far in advance of any other army if we are to fulfill our entire mission in this preparedness question.

Let us not make the mistake of centering our discussion on preparedness around the question of whether we shall provide the personnel for the necessary Army and Navy through voluntary enlistment or through conscription. If voluntary enlistment cannot be made to provide the men required, then evidently conscription must be resorted to. But no man's arbitrary opinion on this subject must be accepted as final. No officer of the Army, no champion of conscription has shown that we cannot provide all the men we need without conscription.

No one should contend that every means of inducing voluntary enlistment has been considered. On the contrary, no move has been made to offer reasonable inducement for men to enter into training in this time of peace. And that is exactly the question we are facing—to prepare for national defense under peacetime conditions. That is an entirely different matter from preparing for imminent war, though the preparation must not be less effective. In fact, it can be much more so.

The country is at peace. But everybody accepts the belief that there is only one certain way of keeping out of war—that is to so thoroughly prepare against attack as to serve notice on any nations which otherwise might consider it to their interest to make war upon us that defeat would be their reward. Our preparedness must be of such kind and extent as to make defeat for any attacker certain. Therein lies our security. We must see that clearly.

I want again to call attention to our other obsolete idea that the Atlantic Ocean is of great defensive value to the United States. On November 12, 1939, in speaking for the repeal of the embargo on arms, I said this:

> Any man of intelligence who has read the news reports of the many appearances of oceangoing submarines along our shores ought to see that the 3,000 miles of trackless waters between America and Europe might well be a hiding place for the enemies of our country instead of her defense against them.

That is still true, and we must not forget that fact.

We should not rush headlong into any plan of accomplishing this preparedness. Our present requirements are to provide a highly intelligent, thoroughly trained Army to man with the greatest efficiency the airplane and tank army, which has shown its overmastering superiority over the armies of the past. The men who are to make up the personnel of this army must be selected from the very start from among the younger men of the best natural aptitude along all mechanical lines. There is one very simple and very certain way of making this selection. We should only pursue the best plan. The best plan depends on the fairest and most democratic way available of inducing men to do the necessary work for preparedness.

If we can provide the men necessary for preparedness through voluntary enlistments, then conscription should not be considered at all. That ought to be clear. The American people do not want conscription unless this is absolutely necessary.

There is no reason why we may not provide for 1-year enlistments. If that is done, great numbers of young men will undoubtedly volunteer who will not enlist for 3 years. Three years is longer than any grown man can afford to take out of his life unless national necessity compels it.

One year's actual service will make a good soldier out of the great majority of American men. And that is what we are looking for—good soldiers. It would be much better to train 300,000 volunteer soldiers in 3 separate years and class them as reservists than to train 400,000 conscripts for any length of time.

Why not call especially on the young auto mechanics to supply especially the men to drive and service the tanks, to pilot and ground-service the planes. There are thousands upon thousands of young men from 18 years up whose interest in machinery has induced them to seek work in the auto shops and as helpers and apprentices in machine shops, mills, and factories.

The man whose natural trend and interest is toward work with machinery and who has already worked with machinery is already far along toward the very service we are seeking. He will be a better man with tanks and planes in 1 year than the man without mechanical trend and experience in 2 years. If he is assured of promotion according to his achievements he will make the sort of tank man or plane man that the fellow without that trend and that experience seldom, if ever, will make. These young fellows who naturally take to machinery are the very ones we want, and who will want this experience. They will enlist without conscription.

There are likewise men whose mathematical tendency makes gunners of them in the easiest and most natural way. Distances, directions, speed of shells is perfectly easy to them. They could pick off an enemy airplane with an antiaircraft gun the first shot. These talents are beyond estimation. None of them should be lost. Then they should be paid a fair consideration for their time. There are 44,000,000 employables in the United States. If the country needs 1,000,000 men, the other 43,000,000 should be quite willing to chip in and put the 1,000,000 on economic equality with themselves.

If we train 300,000 a year for 3 years, that will give us 900,000 men at the end of 3 years. Out of that trained reserve army a sufficient number will naturally take to the service and remain with it to provide every specialist which the service will require.

With 50 divisions of equipment and a skeleton force for each division, the full complement could join the division out of the reservists on very short notice. Fifty divisions properly disposed within supporting distance of one another could certainly meet and repel any invasion that could occur.

The Regular Army will have its full quota of 375,000 before January 1. And these new recruits are reported to be made up of two-thirds high school and college men out of which many specialists will develop along every line required.

And now I come to consider more directly whether we can supply 300,000 a year from volunteers. First, it is necessary to see what has been actually happening along this line:

A letter from Adjutant General Adams, dated July 11, 1940, appearing on page 9533 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that the Regular Army has been overstrength continuously since June 30, 1939, and that every quota released to the recruiting service has been filled promptly on time or ahead of time; and from September 1 to June 30 the monthly average was approximately 20,000, with the exception of February, March, April, and May, during which months, due to overstrength, no new enlistments could be accepted and only reenlistments and replacements were permitted.

Enlistments for the year totaled 158,875, and the enlistments in June 1940 were 22,947. These, mark you, were 3-year enlistments. On July 11, 1940, no request had been released to recruiting service to enlist the last 95,000 men needed to bring the Army up to the 375,000 as authorized.

If 158,000 men volunteer in 8 months for a full 3 years' service, I challenge the judgment of any man who presumes to say we will not more than double that number for 1-year enlistments. Many of my colleagues in this body have discussed this whole matter with me, and the figures offered by the Gallup poll in favor of conscription are not only discounted, but the large number of opinions expressed as against conscription average 95 against conscriptoin, 2 for it, and 3 not definitely committing themselves. This shows definitely which way the wind blows. The American people are overwhelmingly against conscription, and the Congress has no right to go contrary to their overwhelming opinion.

Men and more men! The fact is that the present Regular Army of 252,000 men, properly equipped with the same equipment that has brought the tremendous victories to the German armies would be far superior in striking force to a million trained and equipped as is the present Regular American Army. I find nothing in the hearings to indicate that our Army officers plan any great departure from what we now have, but only the idea to get a lot of new men and train them and equip them just like our present soldiers in the Regular Army—in the good, old-fashioned, obsolete way.

The National Guard of 250,000 men, given the arms, equipment, and the training that the present Germans have, would together provide us with 50 divisions of armored troops, with the men invulnerable to all the .30 caliber rifles in the world. The Chief of Stak seems to stress the necessity of getting officers to train the new men. To train them in what? In using our .30 caliber rifles? Nonsense! Individual soldiers with rifles and unprotected are only good for one thing, and that is to mop up on an enemy already defeated by tanks and planes and to police the conquered territory. That is all; and we are not getting ready for that service. The difficulty to be overcome is to get our own Army officers to see that the whole preparedness program is a question of developing and supplying not only as good but better tanks and better planes than has brought such astounding victory to Hitler's army. If the Regular Army men do not understand and plan clearly for the best possible mechanized Army, our whole preparedness program will be a flat failure. It is fighting machines we want, with great striking power—not great numbers of men with .30 caliber rifles to fool people with.

Warfare hereafter will be a war of machinery and chemistry—ever increasingly so. The nation which makes the most effective engines of war and handles them to the best advantage will exercise the restraining hand over other nations or strike terror to the government which should desire to attack it. It is within our power to hold that position in the world. It would go far toward guaranteeing peace in the world if we should assure ourselves of that position. To do this, the commanders of that army must be thoroughly trained in mechanical arts. I therefore suggest that we construct at West Point a thoroughly first-class mechanical and chemical institute in which the cadets shall be trained in the designing, manufacturing for purposes of instruction, for experience in operation, and upkeep of tanks, airplanes, and chemical devices so that the future commanders may know at first hand what engines of war of various kinds can do and what they cannot do. Without that personal experience no man can do all that can be done in commanding a highly mechanized army. It will be good for our West Pointers to get a little grease under their fingernails; to learn the smell of gasoline; to know why Diesel oil makes the wheels go round; to get the feel of the overalls which was once so familiar to most of them.

There are enterprising men in the Army, plenty of them, who would not have slept through 6 years of preparations of tanks and planes by Hitler. Plenty of them who even with permission to speak out would long ago have prepared and laid before Congress a program for mechanization of our Army. Quite unfortunately our Army, and apparently every other army, is so organized as to prevent men of outstanding ability and enterprise from coming naturally to the front as they should be encouraged to do.

Our Army several years ago had a farseeing genius who pointed out what the airplane was to do. He did it at first within the rules. No attention was paid to him. Then he courageously and patriotically criticized the Army heads for their lack of vision. That brought demotion, an order of silence. Then he scored the ignorance of the Army heads—then the Army heads kicked him out of the Army. Their action indicated that obedience to ignorance was more important that dynamic ideas for the glory of the Army, and protection of the American Nation. Some of the men who participated in that expulsion are still high up in the Army, and the question in my mind is: Have the Army officers who saw no good in his suggestions seen the actual result of Hitler's use of the airplane just as Billie Mitchell saw years ago it could and would be used? The French General Staff committed the same blunder in 1934. When Captain De Gaulle published his book on Mechanized Warfare they paid no attention to it. The Germans saw the book, picked it up, and followed it ardently in developing and using his mechanized army ideas—with what results the world knows. Captain De Gaulle sent a long memorandum to General Gamelin last January pleading for more, bigger, better, and faster and better-armored tanks. He got a rebuke from the dormant General Gamelin for his pains. His enterprise would have saved France if it had been heeded.

What does it take to wake men to facts which they had rejected, and how wide awake are these officers at present? I suggest all of this, not to hurt any man in the Army, but rather to encourage awakening an enterprise and approach to some method of discovering the best men in the Army for promotion, because upon army leadership depends the success of every army.

I have nothing against line promotion, but I insist it must not be so rigid as to prevent the promotion of the abler men in the Army. We need them in the Army, and I repeat there are plenty of them. I could point out a few of them myself.

I understand why some of the Regular Army officers may favor conscription. It is so perfectly simple and easy to reach out and take the number they want. But your duty and mine, my colleagues, goes much farther than that. We must first decide that that method is necessary; whether it is in keeping with the oldest and best traditions of our country—whether it cannot be done in another way much more acceptable to the American people—whether voluntary enlistment would not much less disturb the economy of the country; whether voluntary enlistment may not provide at least temporarily the very thing we most need and must certainly have—a sufficient reserve army to meet all emergencies hereafter. We must not fail in this regard as I shall later point out.

We are promulgating this whole enormous preparedness program to make democracy secure on the Western Continent. We must therefore apply the rule of democracy—that is—to do this as the people want it done; and they surely do not want conscription in peacetime, if men can be had otherwise, and they certainly can, as I have pointed out.

The whole discussion over conscription is one of opinion. Only by trying out voluntary enlistments under a 1-year term can anyone say with any certainty whether voluntary service can meet the requirements or not. With all due respect to our Chief of Staff, the guess of General Marshall on that subject is no better than any intelligent Congressman who knows the sentiment of their districts, as most of them do.

This preparedness program must be a preparedness in the best interest of all the American people—not to the special advantage of any group. The objects must be purely national objects—those objects in behalf of which the American people have always been willing to fight and die, when necessary. It must guarantee liberty and equality; it must look constantly to better living conditions; to the realization of the aspirations of the spirit of America; it must anticipate all those blessings for which men have dreamed and dared throughout the ages; it must give expression to them as a guide and assurance to those unfortunate peoples who seem doomed again to go through revolution and bloodshed to attain what we so long ago established and have for so long maintained in America. [Applause.]

AN AMERICAN SCHOOL ARMY

Our Regular Army officers have never been able to provide for a reserve army of any importance. Yet they cannot fail to know that that is the only kind of an army of sufficient number to make America safe that even this rich country can afford. I do not criticize our Army officers nor charge this failure to them. It is, in fact, the failure of the peace-loving American people themselves to fully comprehend the dangers that beset our great rich country. We have been content to live under the saying of a famous foreigner:

The Lord protects drunk men, fools, and the United States.

We have been going along happily all these years until some great emergency arises. Then we wake up, rub our eyes, and set about meeting an emergency that need not exist and go on for years paying the huge bills for what a little foresight and a small amount of money would have prevented. Primarily America must learn the necessity we are under of planning ahead, and by that means prevent the necessity for emergency legislation along any and every line by preventing the emergency itself. We can and we must do that.

There was absolutely no excuse for the emergency created by the terrible panic of 1929, because we could have prevented that panic. If we had done so we could have prevented the loss to the American people of no less than $300,000,000,000. If we had been prepared as we certainly should have been with proper army and navy in 1914, it is very generally admitted we would not have gone into the World War in 1917. The emergency resulting from that wretched unpreparedness has already cost us $57,000,000,000 and will ultimately cost us seventy-five billion, and an unestimatable amount of human suffering. The present emergency that it is absolutely necessary to meet to certainly keep us out of war this time, before it is over will cost us another $20,000,000,000. And it will be cheap at that if we awaken to the terrible unnecessary costs which every emergency compels us to make.

It is in the hope that this House and the country at large may be ready and willing to seriously consider and seek a remedy for the continuous military unpreparedness which has so greatly endangered us and cost us so dearly, that I am calling this matter to your attention. To give this subject the study and consideration it deserves is the paramount duty of this body and the American people whom we represent.

On Friday, November 3, 1939, with the unanimous consent of this body, I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a bill to establish and maintain the American school army, and to organize and equip the American reserve army. I wrote that bill in the early part of 1916, at the request of Senator Chamberlain, of Oregon, then the chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee. It was the result of a series of articles from my pen which appeared in Harper's Weekly between November 20, 1915, and May 13, 1916. All those articles including President Wilson's commendation of the idea is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 3, 1939.

At my own expense I had the copy of the original bill, all the articles, comments, and resolutions printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, reproduced in a small pamphlet and sent to all the Members of Congress, and to 5,000 military men, educators, and thinkers in the country. I regretted my financial inability to go further in that publication. I have rewritten and reintroduced the bill above referred to, H. R. 10105. I am calling for a hearing on the bill by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House that its technical failings may be remedied, and the idea may be presented in its most practical form.

The basis of the bill is this: After making war under many conditions and over many years in many European armies, it was discovered that a man who had become a thoroughly trained, well-seasoned soldier, never lost that disipline and even after many years out of army life on being recalled to service he did in a few days' time enter fully into his former ability as a fighting man. The cost of maintaining large numbers of men constantly in service—that is in what we now know as a Regular Army—was so great as to be impossible. So the reserve army was developed over other many years in various and finally in all European countries except Great Britain.

By trying many ways and lengths of time it was found that it required 2 years of actual army training to prepare men for the best soldiers under European army conditions.

I had excellent opportunity during my Heidelberg days to observe the German Army in the making. During that period and for all the years since I have probably given more thought to the study of a reserve army for America than to any one subject outside of the very necessary thought of making a living.

The idea of the American school army is to permit boys from 15 to 18 years to volunteer into the American school army for a 3-year period. Upon graduation these then grown men are to remain—what every man in America is all his life anyway—a Reservist subject to call. The 3 years in the school army is devoted about 2 hours daily to military development and the rest of the time to study along any course the cadet may desire, with provision for giving scholastic credits for entry into college or university after graduation. Each cadet must work with his hands along mechanical lines to fit him for industry after graduation. And this will be largely attained through his military training with the mechanized army equipment of the future. The actual schooling is to last 9 months in each year. Then for 3 months, including a short furlough home, these school Army cadets are to assemble in large Army units for such field maneuvers as would perfect them in soldiering for actual warfare which would never come, as soon as we have 2,000,000 of them educated and trained as soldiers to defend their country and as citizens to serve it in industry, in making homes, and living the full American life. There are many other advantages in this system of training which time prevents my here setting out.

And last but not least, we can educate, train, equip, and have always available 2,000,000 of the best Reservists in the world for one-tenth the cost we are paying for these emergency preparations. If we had started this American school army immediately following the World War we would now have 2,000,000 highly trained soldiers and would not have a tremor of fear for the present nor the future safety of our country. It is not only worth our thought, but is encumbent upon us to adopt this or some better plan for a reserve army.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous special order of the House, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK] is recognized for 15 minutes.

WHAT HAS BECOME OF OUR TWO-PARTY SYSTEM?

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, before the Republican Convention at Philadelphia on the floor of this House I predicted the nomination of Willkie and the end of the Republican Party. At least the first prediction came true, and I have every reason to believe that the second prediction will be fulfilled. Being a nonpartisan, I have been able to notice the disintegration of both parties. I have as much confidence in one as the other. In other words I would not trust either of them. Until the voters of the Nation can go to the polls and vote their convictions instead of following party lines, we will not be able to operate this democracy efficiently.

What is the situation with regard to the two great parties in the United States? The Republican Party was so near its final demise in 1932 that it could not be revived. The Republican leaders tried hard to revive it in 1936 and scored the amazing triumph of securing only 2 States out of 48. After that it continued to sink lower and lower and there seemed no power available to bring back a spark of life that would win in 1940 even as much as it won in 1936. A transfusion was ordered; it was apparently necessary; so the convention at Philadelphia injected a good, live blood stream from Tammany Hall of New York. This blood transfusion was recommended by the leaders of the large corporate interests of the United States. Willkie, a Tammany Democrat, was nominated as the leader of the Republican Party. The party is no longer Republican but more Democratic in its complexion than anything else. Thus the Republican Party is still a name, but its real life is inspired by Wendel Willkie, Al Smith, Raskob, and other outstanding Democrats of 1932.

The Republican membership can take it as it is or take nothing. No great damage will be done in any event, for the party was as dead as a mackerel before this transfusion, and if it can survive at all and make any noticeable score in the fall election it will be all to the good.

Turning now to the Democratic Party, we can all remember that it was ushered in like a whirlwind in 1932, led by Franklin D. Roosevelt. The victory was due more to the personality and driving ability of Franklin D. Roosevelt than it was to the efficiency of the Democratic machine. Before the administration got started the President found there was not sufficient material in the Democratic ranks to fill the high places of Government. The Democrats could well administer the post offices, take the census, and fill the lower grades of public service, but the President had to perform a transfusion on the first day of his term of office. He transfused by naming a Republican Secretary of the Interior and another Republican as Secretary of Agriculture. The Democratic Party went ahead with noticeable vigor and in 1936 made an almost clean sweep of the election. After that the party began to sink gradually because of a lack of material in its own ranks to fill the offices of Government.

The President understood the nature of the malady and called for another transfusion, this time a double one. He named a Republican Secretary of War and named a Republican Secretary of the Navy. While the party is still called the Democratic Party, it is more Republican than anything else. The Democratic voters can take this Republican-operated Democratic Party as it is or they can take the Democratic-operated Republican Party. Any way a voter turns he can have what he wants and at the same time fail to get it.

The general mass of the voters should not and probably will not wail very audibly if neither the Republican nor Democratic Party, as such, ever again appear on the political horizon, for neither has kept faith with the people. It will be a hard blow to such stanch Democrats as Vice President GARNER to witness the Republicanization of the grand old Democratic Party, but he can at least take consolation in the fact that such stanch Republicans as the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] will have to witness the Democratization of the grand old Republican Party, and he will probably experience a deeper sorrow when he realizes it was Tammany Hall that robbed him of the lifelong membership in the Republican Party.

In the coming campaign the issues are as confused and interlaced as much as party lines have been obliterated. The Republican-Democratic Party believes in trade agreements that rob our farmers of a market; the Democratic-Republican Party believes in the same thing; the Republican-Democratic Party believes in being unneutral and in assisting England in any way we can short of war; the Democratic-Republican Party believes in the same thing, only more so. Neither is willing to take the stand that we should keep out of Europe and mind our own business. Each party believes in a draft of our citizens while there is no war in sight, and cannot be from the very nature of things. Each party is willing to bleed the people white in taxes to support millions of men in arms, when most everyone knows that our next war, if we have one, will be fought with scientific devices and not by men armed with guns.

The names of these parties are so similar and their views so similar that the two cross-breeds should hold another convention and select a candidate for President by acclamation. It would save the expense of an election, and the result would be the same.

North Dakota went into this blood-transfusion business in a half-hearted way, four delegates voting for the Democratic candidate and four for the Republican candidate. If the delegates were undecided then in their views, they probably will be when the election takes place, and, candidly, I do not knew whether the voters in North Dakota will go Democratic-Republican or Republican-Democratic. If either side will bring up just one single issue of importance upon which they differ, we may brighten up and have a campaign. As it stands now, the people of the United States do not know whether they are going to get straight republicanism, straight democratism, or a mixture of both, or nothing of either. Anyway, I am running for office myself, and hence will have to take my medicine this time—out of which bottle I do not know. There are the bottles—Democratic-Republican and Republican-Democratic. The ingredients are the same; the effects will be the same; but no cure in either. I presume the thing I will do finally is to reach for the cleanest-looking bottle.

The strongest defense we can build in this country is unity of action. Labor has its place; capital has its place in our scheme of government. Private enterprise and Government activities should cooperate, not only in peacetimes but in wartimes; it is essential.

It is well for those directing large capital interests to remember that throughout the world capitalism is on trial. In many countries it has already been condemned and executed. This result came naturally from the fact that capitalism took too much from the people and left the people too little. There capitalism forgot to serve the people but exploited them. Capitalism in the United States has exploited the people, through special legislation and through the purchase of natural resources, which never should have been sold to private interests. In a time like the present capitalism should remember the fate of this institution in other lands, and so arrange their business here as to make capitalism and democracy work together.

Just the moment enough of our citizens cannot bear the tolls taken by capitalism a revolt will occur in this country, as well as in any country; when that time comes, the revolt will sweep all before it—the good and the bad—and in the end individual liberty will be lost in the madness of destruction.

This country should remain liberal, but the times point to the destruction of liberal views and the replacement by ultraconservative views. Should the process be carried far enough, the result will be disunion. Disunion means defeat. France is an immediate example. Three years ago France was a liberal nation, but the movement set in to oust all liberals and supplant them with ultraconservatives. This process went ahead unabated until liberals were arrested, cast into prison, and free speech was crushed. France was in a state of disunion before the Germans set foot on French soil. The advance of the German Army was easy when the only resistance was a disunionized France.

If we can in the United States make capitalism work to the benefit of all citizens in the Union, and bring to the people service instead of exploitation, then capitalism and democracy will survive. Should capitalism, in its arrogance of wealth and power, attempt to force the people to maintain the Government, that will fail. The people of the United States are too familiar with the Declaration of Independence to permit the power of wealth to enslave them.

Since we now have a new realinement of parties in the United States, we are in position to do independent thinking, and our purpose and aim as a body of citizens should be to bend every effort to make our democracy work out to the best interest of all, and our second aim should be to take away from any person, or corporation, or other artificial person, any special privilege that permits him to deny the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to the humblest citizen in the Union.

When democracy begins to work in that fashion, we shall be united and then do not need to fear any power or combination of powers on this earth.

So, whether we vote Democratic-Republican or Republican-Democratic, we can all be united on maintaining this democracy. [Applause.]

SENATE

TUESDAY, AUGUST 6, 1940

(Legislative day of Monday, August 5, 1940)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Rev. Duncan Fraser, assistant rector, Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O God, who hast made of one blood all nations of men: Mercifully receive the prayers that we offer for our anxious and troubled world. Send Thy light into our darkness, and guide the nations as one family into the way of peace; and to those who by their counsels lead the peoples of the earth, grant a right judgment, that so through them and us Thy will may be done. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day of Monday, August 5, 1940, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART], the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

INTERVENTION BY STATES IN SUITS OR PROCEEDINGS IN UNITED STATES COURTS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, which was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
August 5, 1940.

The House of Representatives having proceeded to reconsider the bill (H. R. 7737) to amend the Judicial Code by adding a new section thereto, designated as section 266a, to provide for intervention by States in certain cases involving the validity of the exercise of any power by the United States, or any agency thereof, or any officer or employee thereof, and for other purposes, returned by the President of the United States with his objections to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, it was

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I move that the House message, together with the veto message of the President of the United States to the House of Representatives dated June 10, 1940, with the accompanying House bill 7737, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

FINANCIAL AND OTHER DATA PERTAINING TO CERTAIN GOVERNMENTAL AGENCIES AND CORPORATIONS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, acknowledging the receipt of Senate Resolution 292 (submitted by Mr. BYRD and agreed to July 29, 1940), directing the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to the Senate certain financial statements for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1940, of each of the agencies and corporations enumerated in Senate Resolution 150, Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, together with a copy of the last annual report of each of such agencies and corporations, and stating that the report called for would be transmitted to the Senate shortly after the beginning of the next regular session in January, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted minority views on the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service, which were ordered to be printed in connection with Report No. 2002.

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Special Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources, to which was referred the bill (S. 2576) to authorize the expenditure of the receipts from migratory-bird and wildlife refuges or other areas or projects operated or controlled by the Bureau of Biological Survey, United States Department of the Interior, for the protection of such refuges, areas, or projects and the wildlife thereon, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 2003) thereon.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4196) establishing overtime rates for compensation for employees of the field services of the Navy Department and the Coast Guard, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 2004) thereon.

Mr. WAGNER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 4204) to provide for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 2005) thereon.

Mr. TAFT, as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, submitted the views of the minority on Senate bill 4204, supra, which were ordered to be printed in connection with Report No. 2005.

BILLS INTRODUCED

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, according to the morning newspapers, Mr. Henry P. Fletcher, general counsel of the Republican National Committee, issues another amazing and astonishing statement in the light of the views he expressed in the legal opinion rendered by him to his committee concerning campaign contributions and which I put into the RECORD yesterday. Today's newspapers quote Mr. Fletcher as saying:

> The Republican committee has no intention of evading or skirting the law's provisions, but, on the contrary, we are leaning backward to observe its spirit and letter.

I shall not comment on Mr. Fletcher's remarks about the Attorney General and the President of the United States. Just now let us confine ourselves to the amazing legal opinion construing the so-called Hatch Acts and the equally astonishing statement of today. But here let me say that the same course I shall today lay out for the Republican Party I also lay out for the Democratic Party. There must not be one sauce for the goose and another for the gander. Republicans and Democrats alike joined in the passage of these laws. Good faith and integrity on the part of both parties require equal obedience and adherence to the measures for which they are equally responsible.

It is not my intention to cover today the ground I went over yesterday. It is not my intention to criticize or to condemn Mr. Fletcher today. I only repeat that in my opinion the strictly legalistic and technical construction of the law as given by the general counsel for the Republican National Committee points the way definitely and certainly as to how a law enacted by the Congress of the United States may be evaded and avoided. He explains in detail and with great pains how the Bankhead amendment limiting individual contributions to $5,000 can be made absolutely meaningless and have its every purpose, principle, and intent utterly destroyed. His opinion on the $3,000,000 limitation likewise completely nullifies and destroys that limitation and makes it a thing of no value whatsoever.

In this connection, perhaps the most flagrant statement in the entire opinion is one which was read by me on yesterday but which I desire to reread today. I now quote from Mr. Fletcher's opinion:

> The existing Republican National Finance Committee may continue to function, giving advice and counsel, and will be in constant touch with State and local committees. It should not do solicitations for State and local committees or have detailed knowledge of their subscriptions.

Will Senators listen again to this rather amazing statement? Mr. Fletcher has already said that the national committee should not make solicitations, and then he adds, "or have detailed knowledge of their subscriptions." The chairman of the national committee is advising his committee that they must not have "detailed knowledge" of subscriptions to local and State committees.

Why is Mr. Fletcher so meticulously careful to say in his opinion that the national committee should not have "detailed knowledge" of subscriptions to local committees? There is a very definite reason for that statement in his opinion. It comes from the language of the act itself. I want to read it to Senators, and see whether Mr. Fletcher's statement today that his committee obeys the spirit and letter of the law is a correct statement; for this is what the act says. I read from section 21, the section relating to the $3,000,000 limitation upon both contributions and expenditures:

> For the purposes of this section, any contributions received and any expenditures made on behalf of any political committee—

That is, every political committee. It includes every local, State, and other committee named by Mr. Fletcher in his opinion yesterday. Every contribution or expenditure made by those committees—> made on behalf of any political committee with the knowledge and consent of the chairman or treasurer of such committee shall be deemed to be received or made by such committee—

The national committee itself. The law says that if the national committee has knowledge of or consents to the receipt of contributions or the making of expenditures by the local committees, then those, ipso facto, become expenditures and contributions by the national committee and are within the $3,000,000 limitation; and that is the reason why Mr. Fletcher points out so carefully that the national committee must not have detailed knowledge.

Is that honesty? Is that integrity? Is that adhering to the spirit and the letter of the law, when he sends out word over the Nation, "Go ahead and collect contributions. Go ahead and make expenditures. We give you our consent to do that; but do not do it with our knowledge, or they become our contributions and our expenditures."

No wonder Mr. Fletcher advises that the national committee should not have "detailed knowledge of such contributions or expenditures"; and such advice and such interpretation Mr. Fletcher today says is leaning over backward to obey both the spirit and the letter of the law. Quite true, I think; the general counsel of the Republican Party did lean over, and leaned over so far that he fell with a crash, the sound of which I hope will resound throughout the Nation, and that never again will any party or public official advise how to evade and avoid the plain mandates of the law.

In the entire opinion, which I read yesterday, there was not a single line or word to indicate any conception of or respect for the principle that was sought to be written into the law. On the contrary, the whole opinion destroys every purpose of the act insofar as the limitations are concerned.

This open and flagrant disregard for law strikes at something far more serious than the campaign contributions themselves. We live in a day when governments are tottering and falling all over the world. In the totalitarian states respect for law and obedience to mandates of parliamentary bodies is unimportant, for in such states the word of the dictator or head of government is the law. He is not concerned with constructions or interpretations, but his word is final, and it is enforced with bayonets, concentration camps, and purges if necessary. In a democracy it is not so. Democracies rest upon respect for and obedience to the laws of the land. When that is gone democracy itself is gone.

We have had too much disrespect for law in America. We have had too much disrespect for our parliamentary bodies and the things they seek to do. There has been too much evasion of laws of every kind. The antitrust laws have been notoriously and openly violated for years and years in this country; and the very character of legal mind which devised the way to avoid the limitation on political campaign contributions likewise devised the ways to avoid the antitrust and other laws.

But it is not of these things that I want to talk today. I rose for a very definite purpose—to present to Mr. Fletcher and his committee a definite challenge. Today he says the Republican Party leans over backward and does not seek to avoid either the spirit or letter of the law; that it wants to adhere to it. I shall take him at his word, as I take Mr. Willkie at his word in his published statement of yesterday. I shall impute no evil motives to either one. My challenge is that no contributions for the national campaign be accepted by any local or State committee.

Let all contributions be made to, and all expenditures be made by, the national committee. That is the letter, that is the spirit of the law, and then they would come clearly within the $3,000,000 limitation. That was what Congress sought to do.

What I have said about the Republican Party I also say about the Democratic Party. The same challenge I give to the Republicans I likewise give to the Democrats. The same plan I submit for the Republicans I demand of my own party. Let there be no evasion; $3,000,000 is ample for either party to spend. For once in the history of this country, in the troubled times in which we live, let both major political parties render straightforward, honest, patriotic service. Let the law be obeyed.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to stop with suggesting a plan as to how the law may be obeyed. It is my purpose to go further than that.

The provisions of the law which has just been enacted, and which relate to the making of political contributions, are not my handiwork. I did not draft them, but I am heartily in accord with everything sought to be done by those sections of the act. As I pointed out on yesterday, however, the provision relating to the $5,000 contribution is not in the form in which it was drawn by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. An exemption was added to that section which, since reading Mr. Fletcher's opinion, seems to go much further than I thought it did. Mr. Fletcher may be wrong in his interpretation, but the matter ought to be clarified. The apparent loophole pointed out by Mr. Fletcher as to avoiding the $3,000,000 limitation should be plugged by law, and that should be done immediately.

The convention-book prohibition which Mr. Fletcher refers to in his article appearing in today's newspaper should likewise be made stronger in the law. Perhaps he did not know there is a section in the act which strikes at that evil and seeks to prevent it. That section was not written by me, but was written in the House of Representatives. I was glad to move to concur in the House amendment. While it prohibits buying such books, along with other things, no penalties are inflicted against the seller. That should be corrected.

On yesterday afternoon I had a conference with Attorney General Jackson about these matters. We both agreed that uncertainties in the act should be cleared up as quickly as possible. I have on my desk at this time a letter from the Attorney General pointing out some of the uncertainties and suggesting proper amendments. Those amendments are now being drawn. Just as soon as the bill is prepared I shall introduce it and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I shall ask the chairman of that committee to call a meeting immediately, so that we may write into the law stronger provisions than now exist and erect barriers against any attempted evasions.

I shall now read the letter of the Attorney General. He says:

MY DEAR SENATOR HATCH: I call your attention to the opinion of Henry P. Fletcher, counsel for the Republican National Committee, published in the press of Sunday last, setting forth a comprehensive plan for an avoidance of the limitations placed by your act upon campaign contributions and expenditures.

Briefly, his plan is that, by first subdividing the activities of the party and then subdividing contributions to correspond with the organizational subdivisions, practically all limitation is avoided. It is his view that separate contributions are permitted for each candidate on a single party ticket, and separate contributions for each local committee, and separate contributions for clubs or special committees formed separately from the national committee.

I will say to Senators who are interested, there follows a very interesting observation the Attorney General makes about the plan set up by Mr. Fletcher in his opinion of yesterday. The Attorney General states:

Therefore he contends that by reorganizing a political party, so that, like a holding company, it will have many affiliates and subsidiaries, it can compel the courts to recognize each as a separate entity even if under a common control and working for a common purpose.

That is a very fitting and apt illustration of the plan evolved by Mr. Fletcher. The Attorney General continues:

Unfortunately there are no court opinions available to guide interpretation; and while I am confident that the Fletcher opinion is contrary to the spirit of the act, we cannot overlook the possibility that it might be accepted by courts, since they are obliged to construe a penal statute liberally in favor of the accused.

I do not need to point out to you that if the Fletcher plan is to stand, the hope of checking the power of money over American elections by means of the Hatch Act limitations is gone.

I agree thoroughly with that statement by the Attorney General; if that construction is followed any hope of avoiding the evils in elections, as contemplated by the act, is entirely gone.

The Attorney General continues:

I am in sympathy with every effort to curb the use of money in politics, and am unwilling to approve any plan which defeats the spirit of the act. But uncertainty as to meaning is always a serious obstacle to successful enforcement.

Since Congress is still in session there is time to take up these evasion plans announced by Mr. Fletcher and to outlaw each of them in explicit language.

Another difficulty exists in connection with the provisions forbidding the sale of campaign books, advertising space, etc. While the act provides penalties for those who buy books or advertising, we find no penalty for those who sell them. It is the sellers who systematically plan such devices and bring pressure on buyers to subscribe. If we are to be successful in going before juries to punish those who buy, we must also be authorized to include in the proceedings those who sell.

With that thought I am in hearty agreement and in hearty accord. The Attorney General continues:

Those in the Department who are now engaged in preparing a circular of instructions to United States Attorneys for the enforcement of this act insofar as it is enforceable by us will be glad to give you or any committee any assistance if you see fit to meet these situations by amendment.

As to that I have already seen fit to act, and have asked the Attorney General to work on the amendments, and that is now being done. The letter concludes:

Meanwhile, if the act is to stand as at present, the Department of Justice will of course make every effort to enforce those provisions that fall within its jurisdiction.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT H. JACKSON,
Attorney General.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. There is a very beautiful principle enunciated in the letter, with which we would all agree, but there is, I think, a practical difficulty in providing by law for the punishment of those who sell books and advertising space as well as those who buy. I think that as a practical proposition, if we are to prosecute those who sell, it would happen very often that we would be dependent upon the evidence of those who bought, and, on the contrary, if we were going to prosecute those who bought, we in many cases would be confronted with the fact that we could not obtain a conviction unless we had the evidence of those who sold.

Mr. HATCH. I quite agree with the practical suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The danger is that in trying to be inclusive we will make it impossible for the prosecution to obtain the evidence to convict any one.

Mr. HATCH. That is a very practical suggestion which will have to be considered, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator let me add one further thought?

Mr. HATCH. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. It is well known, of course, especially well known by lawyers, that a man cannot be compelled to testify if his evidence would tend to incriminate him. That is what I was thinking of when I offered my suggestion.

Mr. HATCH. I understand the Senator's point, and I think it is a very practical suggestion which must be considered.

Mr. President, whether or not we are successful in adopting the amendments I have suggested, let that be no excuse for violating or evading the law. Let the law be obeyed exactly as Mr. Fletcher today says the Republican Party desires to obey it. Let both the spirit and the letter, and also the purpose of the law as it was intended, be adhered to with the devotion, fidelity, and respect which all laws should receive.

The plan I have submitted is simple, it is easy to follow. There need be no splitting of hairs or strained construction or circuitous routes. It is a straightforward plan of obedience to law. It is a definite and positive challenge. Will the Republican Party accept that challenge? I wonder.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The statement of the Senator from New Mexico with reference to the interpretation placed upon the Hatch law by the counsel of the Republican Party, and his fear that certainly the spirit of the law is to be evaded by the Republican Party receiving enormous contributions and having such contributions given to State, county, or local committees, is more than a mere suspicion. I wish to have read by the clerk a letter I have today written to the chairman of the Senate committee charged with the investigation of campaign contributions, because I believe it will show the wisdom of what has just been said by the Senator from New Mexico. I ask that the letter be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
August 5, 1940.

Hon. GUY M. GILLETTE,
Chairman of Committee to Investigate Compaign Expenditures, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I request that you investigate what appears to be an effort on the part of some corporations to force employees to contribute to the campaign fund of the Republican Party.

The S. S. Kresge Co., through its vice president and treasurer, Carl B. Tuttle, has distributed to its employees a letter, reading as follows:

"JULY 5, 1940.

"FELLOW EMPLOYEES: I hope you will consider this neither a 'touch' nor a command, but a privilege you may still enjoy as a free American citizen.

"We believe every man who has had steady employment during these past 7½ years, and who has seen the national debt mount from $22,500,000,000 to $50,000,000,000, admitted, and probably much more, will want to take definite action, both in a financial and active manner, to help in the election this fall of Wendell Willkie. The stage is set for a complete upset of the dictatorial administration of Roosevelt, and unless we remove him, in my opinion, we shall need a receiver rather than a President.

"To finance a national campaign of this magnitude requires a very great amount of money, and Mr. Willkie will not be in a position to demand a week's salary from everyone on the Government pay roll, or dole—so it's up to folks like you and me to foot the bill.

"There is also a big job to be done in getting the right men in Congress—for without a sufficient number of sound-thinking Representatives and Senators, a President is severely handicapped. Witness the Hoover administration.

"I have the backing of our officers in this undertaking, and fully anticipate their cooperation. You know corporate contributions are illegal, and we obey the laws. As a starter I will head the list with $1,000 and double if necessary.

"What is it worth to you?

"C. B. TUTTLE.

"CBT:LS.

"Make all checks or money orders payable to C. B. Tuttle, trustee."

One employee who received this letter states:

"Enclosed is a letter sent to me by my employer (S. S. Kresge Co., Detroit), signed by C. B. Tuttle, who is an officer of the company.

"I do not approve of this method of sandbagging voters who are an employee of a company. There should be a means of stopping this kind of thing.

"This company does not appreciate what the present administration has done for them. This method of pushing will not be accepted by a few in this company, but on the other hand it is a deciding factor for a great number. Let us stop this."

Upon inquiry I was advised that the letter was sent to all employees in the administration building in Detroit, or more than 600 persons, and it is assumed has been or will be distributed to the approximately 40,000 employees in the more than 700 stores of this corporation. The letters were not sent through the mail, but were distributed by company messengers in envelopes usually used to send communications to store managers. The name of the employee does not appear on the letter, but does appear on the envelope. I have one of the envelopes which I will be glad to show you. I would ask that the name be held in confidence, because I fear the employee would lose his job if his name were disclosed.

When the vice president and treasurer asks, "What is it worth to you?" the employees know that it is worth their jobs to refuse to contribute. They believe their chances of promotion depend upon the amount they pay Tuttle.

Your committee is directed to investigate and make recommendations as to legislation. While this is the only corporation as to which I have proof, I fear others are resorting to similar methods. I therefore suggest that you investigate and consider recommending legislation at this time. If the contribution forced from the employee reduces his wages below the standard of the wage and hour law, does it constitute violation of the law?

While Mr. Willkie is piously professing that he wishes to restrict contributions, his corporation friends are coercing their employees. Ordinarily giving publicity to action of this kind would result in the public forcing an abandonment of such coercion, but this corporation advertises extensively and some newspapers may not publish the story.

C. B. Tuttle, the man who makes this demand upon employees for contributions, received from S. S. Kresge Co. as vice president and treasurer in 1939 a salary of $89,250. The employees of this company receive small salaries. They should by law be given some protection against such efforts to take from them part of the little compensation they receive. We have by law prohibited anyone from collecting campaign contributions from relief employees. We have sought to protect other Government employees by prohibiting solicitation of employees on the property of the Government, and by those holding positions of authority. We should not permit the S. S. Kresge Co., or any other corporation, to force money from poorly paid employees to help elect the president of the Commonwealth Southern Utilities Corporation, or any other man, President of the United States. In the words of the wage earner who received the letter, "Let us stop this."

Respectfully yours,

JAMES F. BYRNES.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HATCH. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I note that that letter signed by Mr. Tuttle, addressed to the employees of the S. S. Kresge Co., is signed as "Trustee." Does the letter indicate that he is trustee of the S. S. Kresge Co., or of the Republican Party?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I do not know what the word "trustee" means. I wanted to call this letter to the attention of the Senate committee charged with the investigation of campaign expenditures, and I wanted to do it now, while we are still in session. If Members of the Senate will note the language of the letter of the vice president and treasurer of this great corporation——

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at this point to comment on the question asked by the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HATCH. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. I wished to interrupt the Senator from South Carolina simply to make a remark on the meaning of the word "trustee." I think the explanation is that if the employees trust Mr. Tuttle to receive and hold this money which they are asked to contribute to Willkie's campaign fund they can also trust Mr. Tuttle to keep them in their jobs.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes. I wish to bring to the serious attention of the Senate, first, a few of the statements contained in this letter. In the closing paragraph this official says:

You know corporate contributions are illegal, and we obey the laws.

The word "corporate" is underscored in the letter. That means simply this: By law we prohibit the corporation from going down into the treasury and taking the money, the profits of the company, and contributing it. When we do that, who are we saving? We are saving the stockholder, the man who has money to invest. But this official says: "We will obey the law." He did not intend to do it, but he points out, "We are prohibited from making corporate contributions," and then proceeds to call on poorly paid men and women throughout the Nation to take from their little wages and contribute to the election of a President.

There are 40,000 employees in this company. Mr. Tuttle says, "I shall start with $1,000, and I will double that amount if necessary." "What is it worth to you?" he asks the little girl behind the counter in any one of the company's stores throughout the Nation. She knows what that means. She knows that if she does not contribute it is worth her job. If on the average they get $20 from each of the 40,000 employees, there would be contributed $800,000 from one corporation alone. And yet the high priest of the party says, piously, "We must not raise more than two and one-half million dollars."

Should one corporation be permitted to collect one-third of that amount? Oh, the Senator from New Mexico is correct. No matter what party it is, it is all right for it to win an election, but it is not right for it to buy an election. If this early in the campaign, in August, one corporation can demand of its employees, "What is it worth to you? Come across," every employee knows that if he does not come across he is likely to lose his job. If he does come across, his chances of promotion are dependent upon the amount of his contribution. If we cannot prevent corporate contributions, we can give serious consideration at this time to some plan to prevent a corporation from levying in this way upon its employees.

How will that contribution be listed? Will the individual names of the employees be listed? To whom will this one-half million dollars or more in contributions taken from the poorly paid employees of this great department-store chain be contributed? To the national committee? To the State committee? Can they under the interpretation of the counsel of the party distribute it around? If other corporations follow that practice, we will have an election the like of which has never before been seen in this country, when men at the head of great corporations, using their power, will seek to accumulate a fund, to be used, I am fearful, not for proper purposes.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

Mr. HATCH. Yes; I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. TOBEY. I wish to say to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina that I, as a Republican, share his feelings as to the enormity of pressure being put upon employees of any sort in any attempt to secure campaign contributions for any candidate of any party. It is reprehensible, and every right-thinking American will denounce it. But I also recall to him—and it may be that in his earlier days he was perhaps more familiar with it than he is in his later days—a passage from Holy Writ admonishing, "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone."

Mr. President, my mind goes back to a time only 2 or 3 years ago when on the floor of this Chamber and throughout the country there were revelations of what occurred in the 1936 and 1938 campaigns in many States, including my own

State of New Hampshire, of pressure being put, not upon employees of a corporation like the Kresge Co., but upon the poor, humble W. P. A. workers, to "Come across and aid this New Deal campaign or lose your job."

Let us be minded wholly of the principle and not its application to any individual party.

Mr. HATCH. I wish to answer the Senator from New Hampshire on that point. The Senator from New Mexico introduced a bill prohibiting the evil which the Senator from New Hampshire is talking about. The Congress passed that bill, and the very evil the Senator today denounces is a violation of law.

Will the Senator from New Hampshire introduce a bill today striking at the evil the Senator from South Carolina has just pointed out? Will he support such a measure?

Mr. TOBEY. You bet your life I will. I should like nothing better. I hate this evil just as much as does the Senator from New Mexico.

But I come back to my original thesis, that the Democratic Party is just as guilty as the Republican Party in connection with the damnable, corrupt situation that existed 2 and 4 years ago, when demands for contributions were made on the poor humble W. P. A. workers. It stands of record; sir, that that was done despite the law.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. As the Senator from New Hampshire first directed his question to me, I wish to make a statement because I share the views he expressed about the W. P. A. workers. I was chairman of the Committee on Unemployment, of which the Senator from New Mexico was a member. I recommended in the report I submitted to the Senate that the Congress enact a law prohibiting not only the soliciting of contributions from W. P. A. workers but prohibiting any man in authority from attempting to use influence of any kind upon them. That was even before the passage of the Hatch law. In the Appropriations Committee 18 months ago, the paragraph of our report which was drafted by the Senator from New Mexico and myself was incorporated in the relief law. It represented my views then; it represents them now. In this letter I call attention to what we did. Having prevented or done all that we could to prevent such an abuse, we should not now permit a corporation to use its power to take money from poorly paid employees and turn it in to a campaign fund to elect a President, whether or not the individual employee is in favor of the particular party. Such action is coercion, to as great an extent as anything ever complained of against a W. P. A. worker. We corrected the W. P. A. situation. I want the Congress to do what it now can do to stop the head of this corporation and every other like-minded man charged with the management of a corporation from abusing his power to bleed poor people in order to provide campaign funds.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, one further observation, and then I wish to surrender the floor, because the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] desires to speak.

I am very happy to have provoked this discussion today. I am very happy to have heard the observations about the use of money in campaigns. I hope that both the Republican Party and the Democratic Party will respond to the challenge I issued on the floor of the Senate, and will make all contributions for the national campaign to, and all expenditures by, the national committee, staying clearly within the $3,000,000 limitation. Then there will be no evasion. There will be no need for assessments against workers in the 5-and-10-cent stores of the country, and the election will go exactly as it would go if more money were raised.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. In quoting from the Attorney General a few moments ago some reference was made to a holding company.

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. There was so much confusion on the other side of the Chamber that I did not quite understand the significance of the statement. I should like to have the Senator repeat it.

Mr. HATCH. The Attorney General drew a comparison. He was referring to the plan outlined in the statement which Mr. Fletcher issued on Sunday, in which Mr. Fletcher advised the creation of a small local committee in each community in the United States, with the national committee at the top. The Attorney General said that such a plan would be very similar to the holding company evil, with the big company at the top and all the affiliates and subsidiaries beneath. I thought the illustration was very apt.

Mr. LUCAS. In view of that observation, I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] to what he said yesterday. In the light of the last explanation made about subsidiaries and holding companies, all finally finding their way to the top, which consists of one huge company, I am not so certain that the Senator from Indiana will not want to change his statement made on yesterday that Mr. Willkie's right hand does not know what his left hand doeth.

Mr. GILLETTE obtained the floor.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. Surely.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the country is expecting us to look after the business of preparedness. I am sorry that so much talk about purity in one party and corruption in another has been interjected. It seems to me that the remarks from the Republican side were very appropriate. I refer to the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY]. Those who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones.

When the general of the Democratic Party, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] gets the jitters so badly, as is apparent here today, then Mr. Willkie's statement of 3 or 4 weeks ago, that the Democrats have the jitters, is being borne out by what has been said here today. We all believe in purity in politics, but the country does not want to make the Senate a show house as to who is the purest. Neither party has "clean skirts."

We have a job to attend to here. We must keep our heads. There is no need of trying to divert the attention of the people from the real issues, which will be before the people in this campaign.

I feel that the criticism made in relation to one feature of Mr. Fletcher's statement is absolutely unfair. It is true he said that the practice in the past has been that funds have been cleared through the national committees of the Democratic and Republican Parties and then apportioned back to the States. Most of such funds—80 percent in my own State—have not been used for the election of a President or Vice President. They have been used in the campaigns of State candidates, Senators, and Representatives. Hence it seems to me that the idea of trying to project before the people at this time something which will take their minds off the real issue, which is preparedness, is not only impolitic, but absolutely unwise.

I should like to read an article which was handed to me. It is entitled, "Hoover's Mistakes."

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not ask me to yield further for carrying on this controversy.

Mr. WILEY. Will the Senator allow me to have the article printed at the conclusion of my remarks?

Mr. GILLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. WILEY. I shall not read it. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOOVER'S MISTAKES

[From Wallace (Idaho) Miner]

An inspired piece from one of the New Deal propagandists says that "Hoover was a complete failure." So he was. He failed in a lot of things. He failed to draw out his salary of $75,000 a year while he was President, turning it all back into the Treasury. He failed to have his sons organize insurance-company firms to write insurance on Government enterprises. He built a Rapidan resort for fishing and recreation at his own expense and gave it to the Government. None of his sons went racing through the divorce courts to the disillusionment of the public. He never bundled up a lot of governmental documents to sell as a book to the faithful at a huge profit to himself, and he never sold himself into political slavery to a labor organization for a $500,000 campaign fund. He gathered a marvelous collection of war stuff and built a museum for it, but failed to ask Congress to pay the bill—he paid it himself.

He did not preach and promote class hatred and he did not try to pack the Supreme Court. He did not plow up every third row of cotton and he did not promise the American people one thing while at the very same moment doing everything to accomplish the directly opposite result.

He did not ask Congress to assess the taxpayers a billion dollars every time someone shot off a firecracker in Europe and he did not go on fishing trips on Government warships accompanied by a fleet of destroyers. Neither did he kill off all the farmers' little pigs or encourage the importation of Argentine beef. In fact there were a lot of foolish things that Hoover didn't do that some other people have done. There are a lot of constructive things he could have done if he had not had the opposition of a Democratic Congress but anyway he did not leave the American people $45,000,000,000 in debt.

Mrs. Hoover never made speeches or raced hither and yon on unimportant matters. She never wrote silly drivel on her everyday life and sold it to the newspapers and she never sold soap over the radio. Her only public appearance was as an honorary member of the Girl Scouts of America. She never invited Communist youth to the White House as her guests. The Hoover family seems to have made a failure of about everything that goes nowadays.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. Does the Senator wish me to yield to him to discuss the matter which has been discussed? For what purpose does the Senator ask me to yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yesterday on the floor of the Senate my colleague [Mr. GUFFEY] made a statement which I should like to correct, if I may. However, I shall be very glad to wait until the Senator shall have concluded his remarks.

Mr. GILLETTE. I wish the Senator would do so, if he will be so kind.

Mr. President, I sought recognition for the purpose of discussing the pending business before the Senate. A short time ago the able Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] very courteously and considerately called my attention to a letter which he had addressed to me as chairman of the special Committee to Investigate Campaign Expenditures, and asked my permission to have it read at this time. I was very glad to accede to that request. I have not yet received the letter in the course of mail delivery; and when I do, of course, I shall bring it to the attention of the committee. I do not care to comment on it at this time. Neither do I think it is proper for me as chairman of the committee to comment on any matter laid before the committee until such time as the committee, in its quasi judicial or real judicial capacity, has considered the complaints laid before it. We appreciate having the matter called to our attention. Speaking for the committee, I will say that, being a bipartisan committee, we have not acted on any matter laid before us except by the unanimous action of the committee. There has never been any question of the united anxiety of the committee to do everything possible within the purview of the authority conferred upon it to investigate things which subvert and destroy the sanctity of the American electorate.

We have been talking in the Congress about preserving democracy. The surest way to destroy democracy is to destroy the agency or tool through which the people can express themselves fairly and honestly, along the lines suggested by the Senator from New Mexico. Speaking for the committee, within the limits of the authority conferred upon us we will consider any matter which is laid before us for which there is a substantial basis, and will do one of the three things with which we are charged: Report to the Senate remedial legislation suggested; turn over to the Department of Justice evidence of violations of statutes on the statute books; or publish, in the general welfare, information which the electorate ought to possess.

At this time I wish to thank the Senator from South Carolina for bringing the matter to our attention. I am glad it was presented on the floor of the Senate, and I pledge the heartiest and most earnest consideration of every member of my committee.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. DANAHER. As I understood the Senator from Iowa, he said in his remarks that he had not yet received from the Senator from South Carolina the letter which was read at the desk.

Mr. GILLETTE. I have not. As I stated, the Senator from South Carolina very courteously and considerately came to me and asked my permission to have the letter read prior to its receipt, saying that he had dispatched it to me.

Mr. DANAHER. Had the Senator from Iowa seen the letter?

Mr. GILLETTE. I have not seen it at any time. I heard it read.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. I sent to the desk for the letter, and I discover that the letter, which is dated August 5, on a copy of the letterhead of the United States Senate Committee on Appropriations, has already been mimeographed. Let me suggest to the Senator from Iowa that in the course of his inquiry into a letter purporting to have been written by someone named Tuttle, he should also find out why a letter which the Senator from Iowa has not yet received, although it is directed to him, has already been mimeographed for multiple distribution. Let me say to the Senator from Iowa that it nowhere appears that the letter purporting to have been written by Mr. Tuttle was written at the instance of or in behalf of the Republican Party in any way. For all that appears, Mr. Tuttle is somebody who has been a lifelong Democrat, and who has decided this year to take a walk, as many other famous Democrats are doing.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. Let me answer the Senator from Connecticut before I yield further.

Let me say to the distinguished occupant of the chair and the Members of the Senate that until the letter has been mailed and delivered to me, it is the property of the sender, as the Senator well knows; and if he wishes to mimeograph it, make a poster out of it, or do anything whatever with it, it is his property, and I have nothing to say about it.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Certainly there is nothing mysterious about this. The letter was written and mimeographed yesterday afternoon and mailed to the Senator. This morning, when the Senator from New Mexico rose and discussed the subject, I walked around to the Senator from Iowa, having a copy of the letter in my hand, and told him I desired to refer to it, although he had not yet received it, and I asked permission to do so. What the Senator from Connecticut objects to is the distribution of that letter. I do not blame him. [Laughter.]

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GILLETTE. I should prefer not to yield any further for a lengthening of this controversy. There will be plenty of time to discuss this matter, I am sure, to the heart's content of those who are in the Chamber and those who are not in the Chamber.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me say to the Senator from Iowa I simply desire to ask a question of the Senator from South Carolina, if I may.

Mr. GILLETTE. Very well; I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from Iowa.

Let me ask the Senator from South Carolina if it is his practice to cause letters addressed to other Senators to be mimeographed before they are delivered to the addressee?

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. The Senator from Connecticut suggested that Mr. Tuttle may be a Democrat who has taken a walk. I do not know anything about Mr. Tuttle; perhaps the Senator from Connecticut does; but if not a Democrat, he ought to be. He makes a salary of $89,000 a year with the Kresge Co., of which he is vice president. The Kresge Co. in 1933 owed the banks $24,000,000. Now they do not owe the banks a cent. They are among the best money makers we have had in this country during the last 7 or 8 years. So if Mr. Tuttle is not a Democrat, he ought to be one.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I refuse to yield any further on the matter which has been under discussion. I wish to speak as briefly as possible on the pending joint resolution which is before the Senate and on the training of the National Guard under the so-called National Guard training bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa declines to yield further.

ACTIVE SERVICE OF NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVE AND RETIRED PERSONNEL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service.

Mr. GILLETTE. I had hoped, Mr. President, that I could support this measure. I have had a number of years as a trainee in the guard and a number of years as a trainer of the guard. I have had a somewhat interesting, though a very minor part, in securing for the guard Federal recognition and assistance in its training. I wish to speak on this measure from the standpoint of a member of the guard.

I had assumed, from the public discussion and from newspaper articles, that, in the interest of national defense, there was in preparation a measure looking to the proper training of the guard along lines not possible under present conditions, by which they could be perfected in the use of implements of war of modern development and design. I have been willing to go as far as anyone, and still am, in the support of any measure that is designed for the defense of the United States. I was ready to go along with any measure properly drawn for the training of the guard over and above that which is permitted by the present statute. But, Mr. President, I desire to call particular attention to the measure which is before the Senate. There is not one word in it, from start to finish, from top to bottom, from the first word to the last word, from Genesis to Revelation, that deals with the training of the guard. Let me read the title of the joint resolution. It is as follows:

To strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service.

I now read from the joint resolution itself:

Resolved, etc., That during the period ending June 30, 1942—

A little less than 2 years—

the President be, and is hereby, authorized to order into the active military service of the United States for a period of 12 consecutive months, any or all members and units of any or all reserve components of the Army of the United States, and retired personnel of the Regular Army, with or without their consent, to such extent and in such manner as he may deem necessary for the strengthening of the national defense.

Then the joint resolution limits their service to the Western Hemisphere and the Philippine Islands. That is the joint resolution. It is not a measure to enlarge facilities for training the guard; it is not a measure to make available to them as trainees implements whereby they can perfect themselves in the development of military methods and military tactics, but it is a measure designed for the purpose of inducting them into active service anywhere in the Western Hemisphere or the Philippine Islands. That is the measure which is before us. Why is it necessary?

I had a colloquy yesterday with the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Not due to his lack in any way but to my own obtuseness, or the confusion in the Chamber, I was unable to get an answer from him to the direct question I then asked. I desire, Mr. President, to start with the situation as it exists in the United States of America so far as calling our citizens into active service is concerned.

The militia of the United States are citizens between certain ages capable of performing military service. That is the militia of the United States. It consists of all citizens of that type, and is divided into the unorganized militia, the organized militia, and certain naval units.

The National Guard of the States and Territories are organizations composed of these militiamen, members of the unorganized militia, who voluntarily have enlisted in specific organizations for a specific purpose with a specific limitation. That is the National Guard of the Nation.

There is a third category, the National Guard of the United States. That organization is set up under a specific act of the Congress and under orders and policies and regulations laid down under that authority which makes it a separate entity, although its component parts or the men enlisted in it may belong to both of them.

The organized militia of the United States, the National Guard, can be called into the Federal service in only three specific situations, namely, to execute the laws of the United States when the Executive is unable to administer them with the forces at his command, to suppress insurrections, and to repel invasions. So there are three specific conditions under which the President of the United States, by authority of law, can call the National Guard into the service of the United States. For how long? He has to, in the call, specify the time for which he calls them into service. It cannot be for longer than their enlistment period.

There is one exception, that when an emergency continues he may, on his own motion, extend the call for 6 months. But there is a safeguard for the enlisted man who has voluntarily made himself a part of that organization, for he cannot be called out under that authority excepting when the contingencies mentioned exist, when the President has specified in his call the purpose for which they are called, and the definite limit of time, with the one exception noted.

I wish to call attention to the fact—

That the Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, the National Guard while in the service of the United States—

To which I have just referred—the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Organized Reserves, and the enlisted Reserve Corps.

The organized peace establishment, including the Regular Army, the National Guard—

To which I have just referred—

and the Organized Reserves shall include all of those divisions and other military organizations necessary to form the basis for a complete and immediate mobilization for the national defense in the event of a national emergency declared by Congress.

The law provides how the National Guard of the United States may be called into the Federal service.

When Congress shall have declared a national emergency and shall have authorized the use of the armed land forces of the United States for any purpose requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army, the President may, under such regulations * * * order into the active military service of the United States to serve therein for the period of the war or emergency, unless sooner relieved, any or all units * * * of the National Guard of the United States.

Those are the circumstances under which the National Guard of the United States can be ordered into service. When Congress has found and declared that an emergency exists, then the President may order the National Guard of the United States into the service. For what time? For the period of the emergency or the duration of the war. That is the limitation; that is the situation that exists today; that is the grant of power under which the Federal authorities can order into active service the organized or unorganized militia of the United States, and is the only situation under which they can do it.

But what does the pending joint resolution attempt to do? It attempts to destroy that and permit the President, without the declaration of an emergency, without any limitation except a 2-year time limitation, to take the members of the National Guard of the United States and order them to the Philippines, to Rio de Janeiro, to Buenos Aires, to Trinidad, to San Salvador, to Jamaica, order them anywhere within the Western Hemisphere or the Philippine Islands, for that period.

How about the enlistment time, when there is a specific limitation in the present law which says the members of the National Guard cannot be ordered into any of these services for a longer time than their enlistment period? There we are definitely clothing the President with authority to order them into the service for 12 months.

I want to speak for the enlisted man. Every Member of this body who has had any experience with the National Guard, either as an enlisted man or as an officer—and I have had both—knows the sacrifice that is made. Everyone knows what these citizen soldiers do to try to place themselves in a condition of reasonable training so that they may be of assistance when the need arises. I have gone into the homes of these boys when I was captain of a National Guard company and urged their enlistment; I have appealed to them as a patriotic duty to enlist and get this training so that they would be at least partially prepared and in the event that the Regular forces were not sufficient they could be called into the service. Every one of those boys took the oath under section 111, which provides that they enlist for 3 years. They agreed to abide by the rules which require training 48 days in a year. They agreed to the requirement which provides that they shall go to a camp or to a training assembly for not to exceed 15 days in a year, and they agreed that during the period of their enlistment they may be called into the Federal service as the law provides. The law provides that if they are members of the National Guard of the United States, when Congress declares an emergency, they may be called into active service for the period of the emergency.

What are we going to do with these patriotic young men? Consider, for instance, a young professional man employed in a factory, with a family, who has yielded to the patriotic impulse and enlisted as a member of his local National Guard, ready to report for drill, ready to take the training, ready, if need be, under the laws of the United States under which he enlisted, to be ordered into the Federal service; and then we in this body destroy the sanctity of his contract of enlistment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. Surely.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The enlisted men and officers of the National Guard may resign through the Governor of the State and his adjutant general; and the War Department itself advocates that all men having domestic responsibilities shall resign from the guard before this measure goes into effect. If they do not want to be called into the Federal service, they will have an opportunity to get out of the National Guard prior to the enactment of this measure. They have all been put on notice, because this joint resolution is before the country, and they know about it.

Mr. GILLETTE. When were they put on notice?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. They are on notice right now.

Mr. GILLETTE. They are on notice now, when this measure is pending before the United States Senate; but what man knew it when he signed his enlistment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. They may resign now if they want to do so.

Mr. GILLETTE. Was the Senator from Colorado ever in the National Guard when it was called into the Federal service?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I have been at the head of the National Guard as its chief in the State of Colorado and as Governor for 4 years. I do not claim to know all about the National Guard, but I know something about the National Guard.

Mr. GILLETTE. Was the Senator a member of the National Guard when it was inducted into the Federal service?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I was not.

Mr. GILLETTE. Does the Senator think there is any man with a spark of manhood inside his chest and in his veins who, in the face of a call to service as a member of the guard, would hand in his resignation?

I happened to be a member of the guard when they were called into service in the Spanish-American War. I happened to be a member of the guard when they were called into service in the World War. There was not one so contemptible as to resign. There was not one who would refuse the call.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Of course, in time of war there is not one who would refuse; but this is not time of war. They know that. They know that they are going into training; and the Chief of Staff of the War Department is urging any man with domestic responsibilities, any man with financial responsibilities, to get out of the guard, so that unattached boys may come in and take their places. The officials of the War Department do not want such men in the service, and they are frankly telling them so; and the men now have an opportunity to resign from the National Guard if they want to resign. Of course, if there were a war that would be a different matter, and what the Senator states would be entirely true.

Mr. GILLETTE. There is no war now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. No; there is not any war now.

Mr. GILLETTE. Is there any emergency now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. No; to my mind there is not any emergency at all.

Mr. GILLETTE. None whatever?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Not a bit; not a particle. I do not think any emergency is facing the United States.

Mr. GILLETTE. Does the Senator feel that if this proposed legislation should be passed by the Congress of the United States, any member of the National Guard of the United States would refuse an order into the service issued under this measure?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Of course, every man would have to decide his own problem for himself. I do not know that I understand the Senator's question; but I do not see why any member of the National Guard who does not want to take a year's training should not resign.

Mr. GILLETTE. I see every reason, Mr. President. When a man has identified himself with the organized militia in his own community for month after month and year after year, reported for drill and worn the uniform, and then the time comes when he is called into the service by this legislation or any other, he will go, and we are penalizing him. We are penalizing the man who yielded to his patriotic impulse and signed an enlistment blank in which he agreed to report for active service if called under the law which existed at that time when we place him beside his neighbor who refused to go in, and we say, "We want you to go into the active service of the United States. The Congress has just passed a law authorizing the President to call you into active service and send you to the Philippine Islands for 12 months, or to Montivideo for 12 months, because we need you there." I do not know what for, any more than the Senator from Colorado knows; but we are clothing the President of the United States with that power.

Furthermore, the law now provides that if the organized militia is called into the Federal service, the President shall, as best he can, allocate and distribute the need for the men among the States and Territories in proportion to their population. I asked the Senator from Vermont yesterday whether, under this joint resolution, there is anything to prevent the President from ordering any or all of these units into service in the Western Hemisphere or the Philippine Islands.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Iowa is a very able lawyer, and I wish some light. The Senator mentioned the Western Hemisphere. He will observe that the joint resolution, on page 2, provides:

> That the members and units of the Reserve components of the Army of the United States ordered into active Federal service under this authority shall not be employed beyond the limits of the Western Hemisphere.

I inquire if any authority, particularly international law, has declared what territory is within the Western Hemisphere and what is not. I happened lately to be in the company of some well-informed men, and I have always made it a point to associate with men from whom I may learn something. That is one of the reasons why I desire to remain in the Senate. One of these men was a historian; one was a geographer; one was a lawyer of some international note. They were discussing the Western Hemisphere. I said nothing, as it was part of my policy at that time not to expose my ignorance; but not one of them could say what was within the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. GILLETTE. I hope the Senator was not unfair to that assembly in that he failed to contribute his own opinion.

Mr. ASHURST. I asked them, seriatim, "What is the Western Hemisphere?" They disagreed with one another. If there be anyone here who knows what is the Western Hemisphere, I shall be glad to be advised.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. GILLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not propose to try to give the Senator from Arizona any information, because he already has so much more than I have; but, on that point, I heard an argument the other day as to what was the Western Hemisphere. One very striking and cogent statement was that the Western Hemisphere is 180 degrees of the earth's surface—there being, of course, 360 degrees in all—and that the Western Hemisphere comprises all the territory beginning at a point slightly west of Greenwich and coming out over on the other side of the earth, and that within that area is contained a portion of Siberia, a portion of Russia, because it comes out near the United States.

I do not know whether or not that statement is correct; but the application we are using here is that it is these two continents of ours—North and South America—and the contiguous islands. I mean, that is the popular conception of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I believe the able Senator from Texas, who is not only a member of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary but a member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations as well, has stated what is generally believed to be in the eye and the mind of the citizen who refers to the Western Hemisphere, to wit, that the Western Hemisphere is supposed properly to embrace the two continents of the New World and includes such islands as are in the waters of the New World. I have heard it argued that Ireland is a part of the Western Hemisphere; I have heard it argued that the Philippine Islands are a part of the Western Hemisphere; and, while I do not seek to be hypercritical, because excellent work has been done on the pending measure, I believe it would be a contribution looking toward clarifying international law—certainly it would aid Congress—if some proper authority would declare in advance of critical events just what is the Western Hemisphere. After incidents occur it is sometimes difficult to define terms. I heard a great man deliver a noted speech more than 36 years ago, and I shall try to recite a part of it. In that speech, inter alia, he said:

> Events are numberless and mighty. No man can tell which wire runs around the world. The nation today basking in the sunlight of peace and contentment may yet be on some deadly circuit and tomorrow writhing in the toils of war.

That is not my rhetoric, Mr. President. I wish it were. After an incident occurs we probably would not make the same calm, objective decision as to what is the Western Hemisphere that we would have made anterior to the event; hence it seems to me that, in view of the language which has been used, it would certainly be appropriate, it would be timely, and it might save us a great deal of trouble hereafter, if we could have some authority define and declare now what is the Western Hemisphere. I thank the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield further?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the question of the Senator from Arizona is merely an academic question—to determine what is the Western Hemisphere—that is one thing, but for the purpose of the joint resolution we can certainly delimit its activities specifically and remove all doubt as to where we expect these troops not to be sent. The language of the joint resolution could be so amended as to make it perfectly clear.

Mr. ASHURST. I should be willing to leave it to the judgment of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and I appreciate the suggestion of the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. We have the power and we have the right to say what we think is the Western Hemisphere. Such declaration might not be binding upon all, but it would be a legislative expression of opinion which would give the country some degree of security and some information as to what we intended.

I realize that in diplomacy and in war fixed principles soon evaporate and disappear. A man in diplomacy sometimes follows oblique lines and is like a man on roller skates—he goes partly where he would like to go and partly where the skates take him. [Laughter.] It might be that many diplomats would object to delimiting the boundaries of the Western Hemisphere, but it seems to me it should be done.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to direct an inquiry to the distinguished and learned Senator from Arizona. He said that Congress could define the Western Hemisphere. The Senator would not think we could make the hemisphere less than half the sphere, I am sure. In other words, we are confronted with the fact that we have to have 180 degrees or abandon the term. The trouble is that we have taken in too much territory when we proceeded to use the term "Western Hemisphere."

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, the able Senator from Colorado is speaking as a purist in language when he makes that suggestion. I think he made an accurate statement.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Arizona to the language of the so-called draft bill, the compulsory military training bill. There is a provision in it that the spirit of the law must control the letter. I wonder, if we wrote that language into the pending joint resolution, whether our whole problem would not be solved, and if we would not have a definition of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me to reply——

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The scholarly Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE]—and I do not use the word "scholarly" with respect to him merely as a polite designation, for he is one of the scholars in public life—stated yesterday that the language to which he has referred was unusual in a statute, where it is declared in its construction or interpretation that the spirit must control and not the letter. I am willing at all times that the spirit and the letter of the law should control, but it is rather new and startling legislation to say that the spirit but not the letter must control, and I thank the Senator for directing attention to the matter.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Arizona need offer no apology for interrupting the discussion to bring to the attention of the Senate the matter which he has just mentioned. So far as I know—and I heard the matter discussed rather thoroughly in the Committee on Foreign Relations—there has been no legal definition or adjudication of what constitutes the Western Hemisphere. There is no question that we could have a northern and southern hemisphere, divided by the Equator, but a hemisphere, as the Senator thinks of it and as I think of it, is 90 degrees on either side of where we are standing at the time.

I think the Senator has made a very definite suggestion. It would be well to embody in the joint resolution a provision that the term "Western Hemisphere" as used in this measure shall be limited thus and so. That would be very proper.

The language used—that the soldiers may not be sent beyond the Western Hemisphere, excepting into the possessions of the United States, including the Philippine Islands—was to reach the situation as to Territories under the sovereignty of the United States which are not contained within what we usually, in common parlance, consider the Western Hemisphere, such as a portion of the Samoan Islands, Guam, and the Midway Islands, which are possessions of the United States, but under the provisions of the joint resolution the National Guard of the United States called into service could be sent to the Territories of the United States, including the Philippine Islands.

Mr. President, I shall not take much more time of the Senate. As I stated, I had hoped to be able to support the joint resolution, but I cannot support it. I am sure a large majority of the Members of the Senate will support it and it will be passed, but if 95 Members of the Senate should support the measure, I would still take the position which I now take—that when we have carefully announced and set out in the statutes of the United States the conditions and the limitations under which we can call these young men into the public service, with the time fixed, for in every instance as to the unorganized militia, the Organized Militia, the National Guard, and the National Guard of the United States there is a fixed and definite provision as to enlistment, we should not put on the statute books a law under which the President will have the right in his discretion, as he sees fit, to call all or any of them, and not merely to call them but to order them, into active service, not for training necessarily but for service in the Philippines for 12 months, or for such purpose as he deems in the interest of the national defense. In behalf of the members of the National Guard, and true to my obligation as a Senator of the United States, and having in my heart and in my thought the greatest sympathy with every effort to place our country in position of defense, I cannot, without protest, see a crime of this kind perpetrated. I say that in all fairness and in courtesy to the distinguished Senator from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and those who have worked with him. I know how earnestly sioned officers of the guard in Kansas, who would be subject late a safeguarding proposal, but to me it is not a safeguarding measure; to me it means destruction, and I cannot support it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. REED. I share the feelings expressed by the Senator from Iowa as to the conditions under which the National Guard was created. As a matter of fact, under our practice, the National Guard man regarded himself as subject to call locally or within his State.

I had in mind to offer to the joint resolution an amendment similar to that which has been printed, and which lies on the table, offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]. But let me say to the Senator from Iowa that I took the precaution, as far as Kansas was concerned, to write to National Guard men and to telegraph to some of my friends to make inquiry among the enlisted personnel of the National Guard. Then I took the further precaution of asking the Associated Press to carry a statement from me in all the Kansas daily newspapers, which they did, asking the enlisted personnel, including the noncommissioned officers, to express any views and any objections they had regarding the pending joint resolution, which would call them into the national service.

I shall leave the question of whether or not we are repealing or amending or changing the Constitution to distinguished lawyers, and also leave to them the question of what the President can do under the pending measure, if it shall be enacted. But I thought the Senator from Iowa, whom we all esteem for his integrity and his earnestness, might be interested in knowing that notwithstanding the unusual effort I made to develop any objection on the part of the enlisted personnel of the guard in Kansas I have not received a single complaint from the enlisted personnel or the noncommissioned officers of the guard in Kansas, who would be subject to call under the proposed law. Therefore, while holding the same view as that expressed by the Senator from Iowa, I expect to vote for the measure.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. Perhaps I am putting on record my ignorance, but I have been unable to see the accepted distinction which seems to be made by the Senator from Iowa and other military authorities when they say that there may be in the same company, or the same regiment, at one time, the National Guard of the State and the National Guard of the United States. I concede that the Senator must be right, but I really am unable to see it.

The Constitution does not use the term "National Guard." I know that the statutes of the United States make the distinction. I am aware of that. But the Constitution of the United States speaks of "the militia." It is within the power of the Federal Government to call out the militia through the action of Congress, under certain specified conditions, for the purpose of executing the laws of the union, suppressing insurrection, and repelling invasion. I am wondering if it is possible for the Congress to specify some other occasion when it can call out the militia, other than those provided for by the Constitution.

"The militia" is a very definite term. It is a State organization. I do not believe it can be said that part of the militia is Federal and part of it is State. Yet the term "militia" is the basic term with which we must deal.

We have developed the term "National Guard," and now apparently the statutes, and the military authorities of this body, at least, are dividing it into two parts, saying that the State National Guard can be called out only in accordance with the provision of the Constitution, but that the National Guard of the United States may be called out upon some other ground.

Officers of the militia are State officials. The militia is to be officered by the States. The Constitution specifically reserves to the State the power to appoint the officers of the militia. The officers of the National Guard, whether it is in the class that may be called National Guard of the United States, or of the State, are appointed by the State.

I say that because I have not been able to get clearly in mind the dual characterization of the guard, with its inevitable conflict of authority. I know that the Senator from Iowa has a different view, but I do not want the record to continue with the thought that there is no difference of opinion in respect to this matter. I feel that the doctrine of the Constitution as to the militia must be the doctrine as to the National Guard, and that the two terms should mean the same thing.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I can readily see the logic of the position taken by the Senator from Colorado, but under the statutes now on the books a distinction has been drawn. The militia, of course, is defined as all male citizens of the United States of certain age, capable of performing military duty. When the National Guard is spoken of as in the statute, it is the National Guard of the States and Territories. Under the constitutional authority it can be called out for the specific purpose the Senator has outlined, and only that. At the time of calling it out the purpose for which it is called must be set forth. And there is a limitation upon the time it may be called into service.

Mr. ADAMS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. GILLETTE. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. If we have a National Guard of the United States, it is subject to the Commander in Chief of the Armies of the United States, the President?

Mr. GILLETTE. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. Just as every other Army of the United States?

Mr. GILLETTE. No; with certain definite statutory limitations.

Mr. ADAMS. If I may ask the Senator a further question, can Congress—and I am inclined to think it can—say to the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief, that he may not make an order as to where the Regular Army may be sent without concurrence of the Congress?

Mr. GILLETTE. I think so.

Mr. ADAMS. I am inclined to think that is correct.

Mr. GILLETTE. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. ADAMS. But without the limitation of the statute, once it is assumed that there exists a National Guard of the United States the President would have absolute command over it, and could direct where it be sent, unless there were statutory limitations upon his authority as Commander in Chief of the United States.

Mr. GILLETTE. Yes; and there is a statutory limitation.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa, who is a great lawyer, a great farmer, and a great legislator——

Mr. GILLETTE. I disavow two of those qualifications, but may admit that I am a farmer.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the Senator think that the President of the United States in peace times has the power to order a soldier of the United States to go upon foreign soil?

Mr. GILLETTE. No; he has not unless Congress has declared an emergency to exist. That is the reason for the legislation which is now before us.

Mr. ADAMS. If the President has the authority to order a division of the United States Army to go upon foreign soil, the provision of the Constitution which retains in the Congress the power to declare war is of no avail. In other words, that is an act of war.

Mr. GILLETTE. Absolutely.

Mr. ADAMS. It seems to me it is a fair interpretation to say that the President, in his command of the Army, is limited to the jurisdiction of the United States, over which he presides, and that any act beyond that is an act of war, which is reserved for the authority of the Congress.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Colorado is wholly correct. As I have repeatedly stated, my objection to this proposed legislation is that it goes over and beyond the statutory provisions under which these men enlisted and the conditions under which they can be ordered into the service. When an emergency has been declared the National Guard of the United States can be ordered out for the duration of the emergency, but we are clothing the President with power to order it to go to Central America, to South America, anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, to the Philippines, or to our other possessions, for 12 months, without the declaration of the existence of an emergency. All may be called from one State, if he sees fit, or the call may be distributed among the States, as he sees fit.

Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its courtesy.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I wish to ask him a question. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was interested in the Senator's discussion about the limitations contained in the measure on the authority of the President. What is the Senator's view as to the constitutional provision which makes the President commander in chief? Can we impinge upon that authority in any way, and direct him where the National Guard may be sent? I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Colorado also. I am searching for the truth, and I know these two eminent Senators can give us the truth. I should like to get them to cooperate.

Mr. ADAMS. I am sure the Senator has gone to the right source when he asks for information from the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was going to ask the views of the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Colorado as to the ability and power of Congress to limit the authority and right of the President as Commander in Chief under the Constitution. Did I understand both Senators to agree a while ago that Congress could limit that power?

Mr. ADAMS. I was inclined to think that the provision of the Constitution giving to Congress the power to make rules for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces of the country goes that far.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope the Senator is correct, and yet I am rather fearful that under the broad authority to command armies the President could send an army raised by Congress and equipped and supplied by Congress, anywhere he wanted to.

Mr. GILLETTE. In defiance of the right of Congress to declare war?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes. I do not think it depends on a declaration of war. I think the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army, could bring on a situation, if he wanted to, by sending troops to some foreign country under circumstances that would put us in such a posture that we would almost have to declare war. I think the power is that broad. I do not enjoy entertaining that view, but it seems to me that is probably a sound constitutional view.

I wanted to ask the Senator one other question. I heard him talking about calling out troops under terms and conditions that were different from the terms and conditions in effect when the men enlisted. Does the Senator mean that we cannot change the law at all?

Mr. GILLETTE. No, indeed.

Mr. CONNALLY. That every enlisted man has to be consulted about what the law was when he enlisted, before he is called out?

Mr. GILLETTE. No. I mean that we ought not to change the law. I mean that when we call on citizens of the United States, members of the unorganized militia, and ask them to give themselves and their time to the service of the country in the Organized Militia, and they sign enlistment blanks in which they agree to serve under the conditions then existing, that we should hesitate long and carefully, I will say to the Senator, before we compel them to serve under other and different conditions from those under which their neighbors, who have not seen fit to lend themselves to that service serve.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not his enlistment blank say that he enlists under the Constitution and laws of the United States?

Mr. GILLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is the use of having a National Guard if we cannot call it out when we need it? We pay members of the National Guard the year around to drill and train. We give them equipment, and send them to camp 2 weeks in the summertime. If the Federal Government cannot call out the National Guard when it needs it and when there is an emergency, I do not see any use in maintaining it. That is the way I look at the matter; and I speak as one who used to be a National Guard man.

Mr. GILLETTE. The Constitution fixes certain limitations under which the National Guard may be called out, and the statutes fix other limitations under which they may be called out. We are seeking to change the law, and to permit these men to be called for service outside the Western Hemisphere under conditions which do not now exist, without the limitation as to enlistment period, and without the limitation as to the duration of the emergency, but with a specific, practically 2-year limitation.

WENDELL L. WILLKIE

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, yesterday on the floor of the Senate my colleague the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] called the attention of the Senate to the alleged change in the name of Wendell L. Willkie, the Republican candidate for President. The June issue of Town and Country magazine carried a front-page story stating that the family name was originally Willckes.

This morning I received a telegram from G. V. Newcomer, M. D., secretary of the health board, and Calvin Sizelove, city clerk of records, of the city of Elwood, Ind., informing me that there is no official record of a church christening of Wendell Willkie, and no official history of his father or grandfather.

My colleague will grant that many persons have dropped either their first or their middle names. Woodrow Wilson was originally Thomas Woodrow Wilson. Calvin Coolidge was really John Calvin Coolidge. Abraham, the Biblical patriarch, was originally called Abram. The Apostle Paul was at one time called Saul. These gentlemen do not seem to have lost their standing with their public on that account. I cannot believe that the change of a letter in the Willkie family name will long serve to trouble my colleague. Indeed, I should not hold it against my colleague if it should be discovered that his own family name might possibly at one time have been McGuffy. In fact, my own family name was Davies, and the "e" was dropped when my father became a naturalized citizen.

I knew Herman F. Willkie, the father of Wendell Lewis Willkie. The name on the door of his law office at Elwood, Ind., was Willkie. What does it matter whether it is Willkus or Wilke or Willkie? The use of the umlaut over the "u" in German would make it sound similar to "e." Hence, "Willckes" or "Willkus" would then sound like "Willkie."

There is nothing dishonorable about a man changing his name. Thousands of foreign-born citizens have changed or modified their names to meet with practical American usage. Wendell Willkie had nothing to do with the change in the spelling of the family name. The change was made even before his father's time. Wendell Willkie is now known as he has always been known by those who have known him from his earliest days.

My colleague speaks as though any man who changes his name, his religion, or his party politics is arbitrarily to be condemned. Does my colleague wish to set himself with those who seek to resist change? I cannot believe that he does, for he has so strongly advocated the leader of his own party, who has introduced more changes in government than have come in the administration of any other President. My colleague has taken an outstanding part in advocating a change in government such as never before has been contemplated when he seeks to overthrow the American tradition which opposes a third term for the President of the United States. Surely my colleague cannot consider himself hostile to change. I should suppose it might be agreeable to him to congratulate the Willkie family, who have sought to make changes in keeping with growing points of view. Or is it possible that my colleague is frightened at the thought that the Republican Party now has a leader who is determined to make certain changes, not the least of which is a new President in the White House?

Surely my colleague will not deny that Wendell Willkie took a valiant stand in the World War, that he served overseas as an artillery officer, and that he has always been found in the front ranks of those who want to protect the American way of life.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a telegram I have received from G. V. Newcomer, M. D., secretary of the Health Board of Elwood, Ind., together with a statement concerning Mr. Willkie found in the June issue of Town and Country magazine.

There being no objection, the telegram and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ELWOOD, IND., August 6, 1940.

Senator JAMES A. DAVIS,
Washington, D. C.:

The record of vital statistics of Elwood, Ind., show that Wendell Lewis Willkie was born March 18, 1892. His parents were Methodists, and Wendell was received into full membership September 18, 1901, but no record of church christening. His father was born in Aschlersleben, Germany, 1857; came to America when 3 years of age. No history of grandfather.

G. V. NEWCOMER, M. D.,
Secretary, Health Board.
CALVIN SIZELOVE,
City Clerk of Records.

HAS HE A LOOK IN?

Fourth of 6 children of a German émigré couple, the Willckes, Wendell Lewis Willkie was born 48 years ago in Ellwood, Ind. His mother and father were both lawyers, his Aunt Jennie was a doctor, his maternal grandfather a Presbyterian minister; his only child, Philip, was voted most likely to succeed by Princeton 1940. From public school he went to Culver, Oberlin, Indiana's University and Law School. He worked as a bread-wagon driver, a harvester, a steel-mill hand, a Puerto Rican sugar-field laborer, and a history teacher. Radical young Willkie defended pickets, argued to abolish inherited wealth, supported La Follette, crusaded against the Klan. Enlisting the day the war was declared, he served in France, and afterward defended without charge soldiers court-martialed for minor offenses. In 1933 his outstanding success as a Middle West corporation lawyer brought him the presidency of Commonwealth & Southern, at $75,000 a year. He is a member of the Century Association, a Town Hall trustee, and president of the Economic Club. His favorite sports are golf (he rarely breaks 100) and bass fishing. He has 1,000 pigs on his 5 Indiana farms. He dictates numerous magazine articles and any speeches which are not extemporaneous. He has held his own in debate with Felix Frankfurter. He has refused to drive a car since he absent-mindedly left the road to follow a trolley track. One year he saw every show in New York. Occasionally he drops in 21 or El Morocco. He loves early Flemish painting and actually enjoyed his success as a radio guest on "Information, Please." Disarmingly ingratiating, he is listed in the directory under different spellings so that people can find him easily.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 4106) to authorize the construction of certain facilities in Marjorie Park, Davis Island, Tampa, Fla., and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 1114. An act to extend the jurisdiction of the United States District Court, Territory of Hawaii, over the Midway Islands, Wake Island, Johnson Island, Sand Island, Kingman Reef, Kure Island, Baker Island, Howland Island, and Jarvis Island, and for other purposes; and

S. 2493. An act to provide for the operation of the recreational facilities within the Chopawamsic recreational demonstration project, near Dumfries, Va., by the Secretary of the Interior through the National Park Service, and for other purposes.

SELECTIVE SERVICE COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I wish to refer briefly to a news release of last Friday from the Military Training Camps Association, at 28 West Forty-fourth Street, New York City. This release reports "a remarkable shift in public opinion concerning the nearness of war and the necessity for selective compulsory military training as disclosed by an analysis of editorials in midwestern newspapers."

The percentage of favorable comment from the entire country is reported to be 90.5 percent, and for the Middle West 87.5 percent. Thereupon occurs this sentence:

Excerpts from some of the Midwest editorials, assembled State by State, are as follows:

This clearly invites the assumption that the newspapers thus quoted are in favor of the Burke-Wadsworth bill. I assume they are counted in the favorable percentages; but the quotations themselves are partial and isolated excerpts which, taken by themselves, might seem to lean to the idea of compulsory training. Although they do not specifically say so, they invite a totally erroneous conclusion regarding the actual editorial attitude of those newspapers. The net result—wittingly or otherwise—is calculated to be completely misleading and is a type of propaganda which I wish to make thoroughly clear to the Senate.

Let us test this propaganda from the Military Training Camps Association on the basis of the Michigan exhibits presented in the news release. The release quotes 10 newspapers and, of course, adroitly quotes them accurately so far as the verbatim excerpts are concerned; but when the propaganda obviously intends to invite the conclusion that these 10 newspapers contribute to the so-called favorable comment, which we are told accumulates to 90.5 percent for the entire country, I report the facts as follows:

I asked the newspapers specifically by telegraph where they stand upon this issue, all of them, mark you, having been suggestively enrolled by the original authors of the conscript bill in favor of the conscript bill itself. Ten of them reported favorably. One, the Detroit News, supports the pending proposal. One, the Port Huron Times-Herald, supports the bill with reservations. One, the Ann Arbor News, supports the principle but asks for further congressional study. The other seven are opposed in whole, or in substantial part, to the measure which they are presumably enrolled in favor of in this propaganda.

Among the seven is the Detroit Free Press, which did not need to be polled, because its editorial position has been outspoken. The other newspapers may speak for themselves in their own telegrams, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., August 5, 1940.

Senator A. H. VANDENBERG,

Our answer is "No" to bill in its present form. Believe with you that we should try voluntary enlistment first.

JOHN W. RICE,

DOWAGIAC, MICH., August 5, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG:

No grounds for conclusion we favor Burke bill. Have urged more study and consideration, including exhaustion other means enlistment. Critical Army preparedness handle expansion; lack equipment, housing this time. Favor conscription in emergency, which we do not believe at hand.

DOWAGIAC DAILY NEWS,
HARRY H. WHITELEY.

BAY CITY, MICH., August 5, 1940.

ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate:

Although we feel some form of compulsory service may become necessary, we have opposed passage of Burke-Wadsworth bill in the all-inclusive style as given to Senate Military Committee. In criticizing Stimson's recent statement in editorial we are publishing today we conclude with the obvious wish of certain people at Washington to rush a poorly conceived and unreasonable plan through and frighten the country into accepting it without question or examination is endangering entire Army program.

THE BAY CITY TIMES.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., August 5, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
Senate Office Building:

The Grand Rapids Press never has endorsed Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill. We have maintained open mind on subject of conscription generally, but have favored thorough trial of voluntary-enlistment plan first. We seek exhaustive debate and discussion of conscription proposal and demand clear demonstration of its need. Even if conscription is deemed necessary, believe it should be sharply modified from form of Burke-Wadsworth draft. Seriously doubt materials available for useful training of huge draft Army. Can't see how anyone could construe our attitude as favoring passage of pending bill, or even as proconscription.

THE GRAND RAPIDS PRESS.

JACKSON, MICH., August 5, 1940.

Hon. A. H. VANDENBERG,
Senate Office Building:

Citizen Patriot opposes Burke-Wadsworth bill. Said in editorial August 4, quoting American Legion statement: "The Legion perceives that the 'pack' which is now 'off in full cry for the establishment of compulsory military training' is the same group which is clamoring to take our people into the war and ultimately to fight in Europe, regardless of protestations to the contrary." Editorial today—August 5—says, "ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG is demonstrating again the courage which, combined with broad understanding and high intelligence, makes him an outstanding Member of the United States Senate.

"Leading the opposition to an unnecessary and unwise war hysteria, Michigan's senior Senator opposes a pell-mell rush into Nation-wide military conscription in peacetime."

CARL M. SAUNDERS.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, many earnest, distinguished, wholly conscientious, and deeply patriotic citizens are associated with the Military Training Camps Association, with headquarters in New York. I do not impugn their motives. They believe in immediate conscription, and they are entitled to full faith and credit for their views. I understand that the basis of the conscript bill is their handiwork. But I protest this propaganda effort to make the country believe that editorial opinion asks for the enactment of the Burke-Wadsworth bill, at least so far as my section of the country is concerned. If the Michigan exhibit is any criterion, and if the attitude of these particularly quoted newspapers is indicative of the basis of the association's poll of Nation-wide editorial opinion, then the association's press release grievously misleads those whom it purports to instruct. It becomes increasingly evident that Congress and the country are sadly in need of real facts in respect to the conscription issue.

Mr. HOLT obtained the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield while I send to the desk and have read a copy of a letter sent out by five of the railroad brotherhoods, and signed by A. Johnston, Grand Chief Engineer, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; D. B. Robertson, president, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen; J. A. Phillips, president, Order of Railway Conductors of America; A. F. Whitney, president, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen; and T. C. Cashen, president, Switchmen's Union of North America?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield for that purpose?

Mr. HOLT. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Order of Railway Conductors of America, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Switchmen's Union of North America]

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 1, 1940.

The Honorable MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Chairman, Senate Military Affairs Committee, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

The Honorable ANDREW J. MAY,
Chairman, House Military Affairs Committee, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: The undersigned chief executives of the organizations representing engineers, firemen, conductors, trainmen, and yardmen employed on the railroads of the United States have this day given consideration to the provisions of the proposed compulsory peacetime draft or conscription bill which contemplates the inducting into the military and naval service of the United States in the immediate future some hundreds of thousands of citizens of this country for a period of training.

We refer to the Burke-Wadsworth bill now before Congress for consideration and feel that you should be made acquainted with our views, which we are confident reflect the views of the membership of these organizations employed on American railroads.

We are in general agreement with the prevailing sentiment in the United States that every support should be given to adequate measures necessary to the protection of our democratic institutions against attack from the force of dictatorship, both within and without our country. However, grave doubt exists in many quarters with respect to the wisdom of enacting a peacetime conscription bill when it is believed other adequate measures are available. Such proposal borders closely on the principle of dictatorship, and we hold the view that regimenting our people is un-American and unnecessary.

Patriotism is not the monopoly of those who are feverishly urging this conscription bill. We may rightly assume that all citizens are patriotic and if given the opportunity and impressed with the necessity for their doing so, they will volunteer their services in defense of our country.

At present there is a vast army of unemployed, thousands of whom would be desirous of enlisting in the military and naval service if given an opportunity to do so, but they are so circumscribed by technical military and naval physical requirements that many of them are precluded from voluntary enlistment. Consideration should be given to assisting them in removing minor physical defects so that they may be acceptable as volunteers.

Compulsory military service in time of peace is the very antithesis of freedom. It involves an infringement on the very principles of democracy which it is invoked to defend. It imposes upon the individual a mandate to give service which he may not be in position to render without serious sacrifices on the part of himself or his family, or both, and this at a time when there are thousands of other individuals who would be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity to serve if such opportunity were not denied by the restrictive rules observed by the recruiting service.

The youth of our country who are inducted into the military and naval services under the principle of conscription and who are made to serve will quite naturally acquire the viewpoint that forceful means should be adopted in all the affairs of life as an avenue to achieve desired ends.

While you are giving thought to the Burke-Wadsworth bill let not the hysteria of the moment sweep you into supporting such a drastic and ill-advised change in the American way of life. Democracy means that the state exists to serve the individual. The program at present contemplated will cause hundreds of thousands of our youth to become "war minded" and will, if carried out, establish the fabric of a giant war machine, which experience teaches us cannot and will not be permitted to rust in peace. "War games" inevitably lead to war. The voluntary-enlistment principle confines and restricts the dissemination of "war mindedness" to actual necessities through the longer term of service and, above all, preserves the principle of democracy in its strictest sense.

These organizations are wholeheartedly in accord with the establishment and maintenance of an adequate national defense, and their membership will not be found wanting in any support of such proper measures, but we are convinced that under present conditions the regimenting of our people according to the contemplated military pattern is unnecessary and is an infringement upon the civil liberties which they may reasonably expect to enjoy.

We trust that your committee will not favorably report the Burke-Wadsworth military conscription bill.

Respectfully yours,

A. JOHNSTON,
Grand Chief Engineer, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

J. A. PHILLIPS,
President, Order of Railway Conductors of America.

D. B. ROBERTSON,
President, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.

A. F. WHITNEY,
President, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

T. C. CASHEN,
President, Switchmen's Union of North America.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I want the people of the United States to have the facts. Some time ago I presented the background of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies. They have now changed that name. I told the Senate where that committee started, who was its president, and its background. This afternoon I intend to tell the Senate the background of and who is behind the conscription drive in America. The conscription drive was started at the Harvard Club in New York City. Perhaps the name should not be pronounced as I pronounce it, but in the way its members and perhaps some newspaper columnists pronounce it—the Hahva'd Club. It was at the Harvard Club on the 22d day of May that these patriots met to start the conscription drive. Some of these are the same individuals who have been talking about regimentation in America. Oh, they despise regimentation; they delivered speeches over the radio; they appeared before congressional committees and said "Do not pass this law against business because it is regimentation"; but they were the prime movers in the conscription drive not only to regiment America but literally to regiment American boys.

Who are those brave patriots who put this bill across in the meeting on the 22d day of May? I ask that at the conclusion of my remarks the list in full be printed, but I desire to comment on some of those individuals at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the list will be printed at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. HOLT. Who do we find was there at that time? We find Mr. Grenville Clark, of the proletarian law firm of Root, Clark, Buckner & Ballantine, who have so loyally fought regimentation in America.

Grenville Clark is a good lawyer; there is no doubt about that; but America has an obligation in peace as in time of war; the country has to raise taxes in peace as in war. Now, let us see what Mr. Clark's record is as a citizen relative to the raising of taxes to maintain an army. Let us look at the record. Let me quote from the Washington Evening Star of the 1st day of July 1937. I may add that Mr. Grenville Clark was the man who actually wrote the original bill which has been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. I read:

(By the Associated Press, July 1, 1937)

Congressional tax investigators received testimony today that Mrs. Grenville Clark, of New York, had saved $90,000 in taxes in 1 year through the use of 16 trusts.

Paul W. Bruton, Internal Revenue Bureau attorney, identified her as the wife of a member of the law firm of Root, Clark, Buckner & Ballantine.

Bruton also testified Martin F. Tiernan, who apparently lives at Essex Falls, N. J., and Charles F. Wallace, of Westfield, N. J., had accomplished "a total reduction in their income taxes of $611,328" in 1935 and 1936 by the use of multiple trusts for the benefit of minor children.

The article continues:

CHILDREN DECLARED BENEFICIARIES

The Clark trusts were established, Bruton said, by both Mr. and Mrs. Clark, and operated so that during the 1936 tax year each of their three children was the sole beneficiary of five separate trusts, and also was one of the ultimate beneficiaries of another insurance trust.

Mr. Clark and the Fiduciary Trust Co. are the trustees of each trust, the youthful-appearing lawyer asserted.

I may interpolate that practically all the directors of the Fiduciary Trust Co. are in the drive for the conscription bill. The article proceeds:

Referring to 1936 tax returns, Bruton said 16 individual returns were filed by the trustees, showing separate trust incomes aggregating $170,236, on which taxes totaled $10,930.

He said an individual exemption had been claimed for each trust, and that the splitting of income among the 16 trusts resulted in a drastic reduction of surtaxes.

"Had one trust been created," he added, "the trustees would have paid $77,311, or $66,381.23 more than they did. Had no trusts been created and the trust income included in that of Mrs. Clark, the total taxes collected would have been approximately $90,000 more than have been paid."

That is from the Associated Press. Reading from the record of the Congressional Committee on Tax Evasion and Avoidance, we find a reference of the Treasury officials to Mr. Grenville Clark, who loves his country so much that he wants to regiment the boys to protect it. Let me quote from that:

Had one trust been created, the trustees would have paid $77,311.30, or $66,381.23 more than they did. Had no trusts been created and the trust income included in that of Mrs. Clark, the total taxes collected would have been approximately $90,000 more than have been paid.

Finally, and I think this is important:

If one trust had been created for each child, approximately $24,300 more taxes would have been collected from the trustees.

I could go ahead and read further from that record, but now just turn to 1940. What would happen, if this conscription bill passes; if an American boy, in order to avoid his duty of serving in the forces of the Army, should use the same type of evasion that Mr. Clark used in avoiding his taxes in 1935? That boy would be in the penitentiary.

While these patriots are perfectly willing for the boys to have no exemption, how are we going to finance these boys if the people do not pay their just and rightful share of taxes? That is the man who actually penned the conscription bill that is now before us. Such patriotism!

Of course, I could go ahead and discuss Mr. Clark at some length, but it is not necessary to do so. He is one of the individuals behind the conscription bill.

Who else was there? Gen. John F. O'Ryan. Let me read to you what General O'Ryan said before the last war as to why we should draft boys and have them ready for war. This is the exact language of General O'Ryan then, and I want to read it to the Senate:

The first thing that must be done is to destroy all initiative, and that with the training fits men to be soldiers. * * *

The recruit does not know how to carry out orders. His mental state differs from that of the trained soldier who obeys mechanically. We must get our men so that they are machines.

We have to have our men trained so that the influence of fear is overpowered by the peril of an uncompromising military system often backed up by a pistol in the hands of an officer.

I want to repeat the words of General O'Ryan as to the need of conscription. This is what he says:

We have to have our men trained so that the influence of fear is overpowered by the peril of an uncomprising military system often backed up by a pistol in the hands of an officer.

Then he continues:

The recruits have got to put their heads into the military noose. They have got to be jacked up. They have got to be bawled out.

General O'Ryan, as most of you know, has already advocated the entrance of the United States into this war. He is in favor of the United States going over there now. He is for conscription, and was present at the Harvard Club when this committee was set up.

Who else was there? Let us go down through the list of some of them.

Lewis W. Douglas was there. I shall not say about him what the President did. I shall just pass him over.

Who else was there? Henry L. Stimson, the Secretary of War, who is carrying out in the Cabinet the wishes of those who want us to go to war. No matter how much he proclaims otherwise to the public, Henry L. Stimson would be for war today if he felt he could get a declaration of war through Congress. Henry L. Stimson has been present at all these meetings to push America a little closer to the precipice. Henry L. Stimson was present at the meeting, as he was at the meeting that set-up the infamous Clark-Eichelberger-William Allen White committee. Was that why he was appointed to the Cabinet, because they knew his record so well?

Who else was present at this meeting to draft American boys? Robert P. Patterson, who is now Assistant Secretary of War. He was present. No wonder Mr. Stimson wants him as his assistant in the Department of War.

Who else was present at that meeting? I was speaking a moment ago of Lewis Douglas. I do not want to bring politics into this matter. I want to be fair. Whom else do we find? Elihu Root, Jr. He was present at that meeting to set up this conscription drive. He is also a member of the firm of Root, Clark, Buckner, and Ballentine, and has many other interests that I could name to you, but I do not want to delay the Senate.

Who else was present at that meeting? Julius Ochs Adler, general manager of the New York Times, and a man who holds stock in corporations located in countries now at war. Mr. Adler wants the American boy to protect his investments.

Now let us see who else was there. We find that Mr. K. P. Budd was there. That may not mean anything to you; but who is Mr. K. P. Budd? He is a director of the North British and Mercantile Insurance Co., with headquarters in London.

Let us look at the others that we have in the list. We find Mr. J. B. Taylor, Jr., who has money invested in aircraft, and a director of aviation corporations.

Let us see who else was there. We find Mr. F. M. Weld. Who is Mr. Weld? I will tell you who he is. He is a director of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, which is making millions out of this war.

Now let us go down the list of these individuals, and see what their patriotism is, that they want American boys to be regimented. What else does Mr. Weld do? He is in the oil business, in the Pilgrim Exploration Co., and other enterprises that I could mention to you.

Whom else do we find present at that meeting? Brig. Gen. Benedict Crowell, who was Assistant Secretary of War and Director of Munitions during the World War. You recall that—the Director of Munitions during the World War—do you not? He was also present at the Harvard Club to set up this conscription drive to get American boys in the Army. Other individuals were present whose names I could place in the RECORD, together with a list of the interests with which they were identified.

They met on the 22d day of May and established this drive for conscription. On the 23d day of May they went back to the same club and there passed resolutions for "aid to the Allies short of war." I have been advised that their statements there were as bellicose as if we were in war at that time.

Now, let us see what else they did. They know where to get money. What did this committee do? On the 3d day of June they met again. They met to raise money. It is hard to tell how much they raised, but they said they were going to raise one-quarter of a million dollars. What for? Why should men in business have to raise a quarter of a million dollars to drive a conscription bill through the Congress of the United States? Why, I ask again, should businessmen raise a quarter of a million dollars to drive conscription through the United States Congress? If conscription was a good thing for this country, would not our Army and Navy ask for it without pressure? Would we not vote for it without propaganda to drive us into line? That quarter of a million dollars was to pay for the type of propaganda spoken of just a moment ago by the Senator from Michigan. A quarter of a million dollars was raised at that one time. Think of that—men raising a quarter of a million dollars to conscript boys in America. Such patriotism.

Who else was present? And what financial enterprises do we find that these individuals are engaged in? Here are some of their financial holdings: We find that some of them have foreign investments—very decided, strong, large foreign investments. We find that some of them are directors of abrasive companies, directors of rubber companies, directors of chemical companies, directors of wire companies; and wire is very important in war. It is very usual to see a boy, one of these conscripted boys, hanging over a barbed wire, with his stomach torn open by a bomb. So we need wire in war.

Whom else do we find? We find directors of iron-ore mines and iron furnaces, directors of oil companies, directors of British insurance companies, of aircraft companies, of the Baldwin Locomotive Co., of machine tools, of phosphates, of air brakes; and in that list you will find such a group of patriots as this country has never seen.

No; conscription did not come from labor, as shown by the letter read to the Senate at the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. Conscription did not come from the railroad brotherhoods, the C. I. O., the American Federation of Labor, the Grange, or the poor people, if I may use that word.

It came from those individuals who have interests to protect in this war, and, if necessary, to protect them they will sacrifice American boys on the battlefields of any continent to protect them as they did before. I intend to discuss the matter later, either this week or next week, but some of the individuals who are behind this drive for conscription, and helped finance it, are the same individuals who were anxious to push America into the World War before 1917.

Let me say this afternoon, whether my colleagues agree with me or disagree with me, I have never made a statement on the floor of the Senate if I did not have information and facts with which to back it up. It will be found that these patriots are willing to conscript boys, but when you start talking about drafting wealth, what does the New York Times say? It says that we should go slowly on excess-profits taxes, that we should go slowly on drafting wealth, but full speed ahead on drafting boys. Yes; slow up on drafting wealth but full speed ahead on drafting boys. Conscript 100 percent of their wealth.

When you start talking about drafting wealth, that is regimentation and communism, but when you talk about taking boys, taking them away to their possible death, that is not regimentation to them, that is democracy. Democracy! Look at these individuals behind it. We find these individuals like Henry Stimson, Julius O. Adler, Lewis Douglas, John F. O'Ryan, Karl H. Behr, Elihu Root, Jr., and Grenville Clark, back of moves to push America closer to the precipice of war. They say we are not in the war. I am tired of these people talking in denial about us taking steps toward war, but we are gradually going down that road, and sooner or later we are going to get close to the precipice and then it means war itself.

They are the same individuals who are advocating today an act of war in the sale of destroyers. I gave the names of some of the individuals who helped finance the advertising campaign before the recent conventions. We found international bankers of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. I received a telegram from Mr. Thomas, of Lehman Bros., this morning, who helped finance the advertising toward our involvement in war, asking me to go along and support the sending of destroyers to England. Director of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., director of Lehman Bros., director of J. Pierpont Morgan & Co., director of the Guaranty Trust Co., and others have been named. Every single, solitary large international banking house in New York is represented on one of these committees, either financially or otherwise, except one.

The call for conscription did not come from the farms of America—and the farms of America are just as patriotic as any other place in America. If the farmers felt we were in need of this, they would be for it. It did not come from Main Street of America. Give me a boy on Main Street, and I will show you a boy who will fight just as much as the boy who is reared on Wall Street. The call for conscription came from this international crowd which tried to get us into the League of Nations, which tried to get us into the World Court, and have gradually tried to push us into involvement in international affairs abroad. I intend to discuss that longer at a later time. I intend to let the people of America have the facts, and let them know who is writing these bills and who is pushing them.

At times we see in the London newspapers what will happen in the United States. Then a few weeks later we find the story in New York City; then next we find a bill introduced in the Congress of the United States. It is almost uncanny to study the predictions which have come out of the magazines of London as to what America was going to do. I intend to read those to the Senate, and show what they said was going to be done. No greater prophet ever lived in history than the prophets of the London magazines, who have told what America is going to do as to involvement in this war—and those papers are not written for America; they are written for the English public, and the individuals do not get the facts.

Such papers as the New York Times, controlled by Mr. Adler, who has been howling regimentation, never say a word in behalf of anything to which they are opposed, but try to mislead the people, as they tried to create the impression last week that conscription was already through. Individuals have said to me, "I intended to write you a letter, but I heard Mr. Kaltenborn on the radio, and he said conscription was through, that there was no need to write." That is part of the program to put America to sleep, so that the people will think there is no opposition. But so long as Americanism is present in Congress, there will be opposition to this alien doctrine of conscription, and the conscription program, which did not come from America, but came from foreign shores, and was incubated in the banks and law firms of New York City on Wall Street.

[Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the Chair). The Chair must admonish the occupants of the galleries that they are present as guests of the Senate, and if continued demonstrations occur, the galleries will be cleared. The occupants of the galleries must observe the rules. It is a rule of the Senate that there must be no demonstrations in the galleries.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I hold no brief for the men just excoriated by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT]. So far as I know, they are high-class, patriotic gentlemen, although they might belong to the Harvard Club. I think the men who gathered on the occasion referred to by the Senator from West Virginia to draft the conscription bill were sincere, honest, patriotic men. It may be true that they come from the upper crust, so to speak, and God knows I hold no brief for them.

The Senator from West Virginia has been putting into a certain category everyone who happens to stand for the legislation that is pending and that which will shortly be pending before the Congress of the United States. The Senator will stand and brand them, and all the rest of us who happen to believe in the legislation in which they believe, as belonging in the same category. Perhaps the Senator is right, but I get a little weary at being lectured about patriotism by the Senator from West Virginia. He has told the Senate who was at this meeting where patriots met to consider defense measures for this country. I will tell the Senate who was not there. There were not any Holts there, because the Holt family does not teach that kind of doctrine. When I was over in France in 1917 and 1918, the father of the Senator from West Virginia was preaching that people should not raise any food to send to me and my comrades who were fighting for this country in France. The father of the Senator from West Virginia sent his son, who was eligible for service, to hide away in South America to avoid the draft. Talk to me about patriotism. That is the kind of patriotism that is represented by the Senator from West Virginia. So I get a little impatient with that kind of patriotism.

I get a little impatient at being lectured from a slacker family about what I consider to be my patriotic duty in the crisis which faces my beloved country at this time.

Mr. President, I am not speaking for the men of the Harvard Club, but I am speaking for the men who went out with me in 1917 and 1918, who had the courage to go upon the battlefields of France to fight for our country, and die for it, if need be, and the father of the Senator from West Virginia was preaching to the people not to send me food.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. HOLT. I merely wish to say that as soon as the Senator concludes I will answer his malicious lie. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

Mr. MINTON. That is the evidence that was given before a committee——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana will suspend.

Mr. MINTON. I suspend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will give those in the galleries who are visiting the Senate one more opportunity to observe the common courtesy guests owe their host. If the occupants of the galleries do not observe the rules by refraining from demonstrations of approval or disapproval, the Chair will see that the galleries are cleared. In the meantime the Chair charges the doorkeepers and those in charge of the galleries to observe and see if it is possible to note those indulging in applause, and escort them from the galleries, in order that those persons who are willing to abide by the rules and conduct themselves properly may not be penalized. The Senator from Indiana may proceed.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I quoted the documents of the United States Senate for the evidence that I am giving. It was testified to, and evidence was produced before a committee here in the United States Senate, as I understand, in which the charges were made against the father of the Senator from West Virginia that I have uttered here on the floor of the Senate.

So, Mr. President, I, for one, am supporting this legislation because I believe it is my patriotic duty to do so. I do not want to have to conscript boys. It is no pleasure for me to do so. But we do not have any choice in the matter. There is a man across the sea who marches today before the greatest military force the world has ever known, and he crushes out, one by one, the democracies of the world and marches on and on to new victory. It is his philosophy that it is the duty of himself and his kind to crush out democracy in the world and to set up the rule of his own people over the rest of us. I stand in fear of that dreadful doctrine. I want to see America preserved. I want to see America go along happily down the road as she has in the years that have gone by. I do not want to see the will of a foreign conqueror imposed upon the free people of America.

I believe that this threat is here. I believe that we are confronted with a frightful crisis. We do not have to send our men to fight over there, or to fight anywhere, except in defense of America; but I say that the exigencies of this occasion demand that we should get our manpower ready to fight and defend America if it should ever unhappily be challenged.

I say, Mr. President, that I do not want to conscript boys. I would not conscript boys if I did not feel that it was necessary. Why did you conscript them in wartime? Only because you thought it was necessary. If you are going to conscript them now, you are going to conscript them only because you think it is necessary.

Are we in an emergency or are we not? If we were not in an emergency which demanded this preparation, why did we unanimously vote these billions of dollars to buy ships and airplanes and tanks and other equipment? They do not man themselves. The United States Senate voted unanimously billions of dollars for all this equipment. How are we going to operate it if we do not man it?

The Army tells us that the volunteer system will not get the men in the quantities and at the time they need them for their training purposes. The Army and the Navy have the responsibility for using these weapons for the defense of our country. These men who have that responsibility come in and tell us time and again that if we are going to use these weapons, then we must have the men to use them. Are we to say to the staffs of the Army and the Navy charged with the responsibility of using these engines of death upon the battlefield, of defending America if the time should ever come when that is necessary, that they shall not have these men to train them and get them ready, if that unhappy day should ever come?

Mr. President, there are some of us who have faced this unhappy circumstance with heavy hearts. As I looked into the face of my little boy, who was 6 months old before ever I laid eyes on him—he was born while I was over in France—I uttered a silent prayer that God forbid that ever he would have to go into another war. He is 21 years old today, and he had the courage to go out on his own and offer his services to his country by enlisting in the Reserve Corps, and he is but a schoolboy yet.

I have another boy who is 15 years old. I love those youngsters as any father loves his son, and I do not want them to go to war. I do not want any mother's son to go to war. But if war should unhappily come, and the crisis should come in this country, I would be ashamed of my sons, much as I love them, if they turned their backs like slackers upon their country in the hour of its need.

Mr. President, I feel keenly about this matter. If the time comes that Congress shall vote for another war, and it becomes my duty to do it, I will stand up and do it like a man, but God forbid that ever I have to do it. But if that unhappy time comes I will walk out of my door, and take my boys' hands in mine, and we will go down to the recruiting station together and do our duty as American citizens.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I do not know what caused the Senator from Indiana to get in the spirit that he has gotten into. I notice he has been going back and forth out of that door. But I want to say this, that if the shoe fits the Senator from Indiana he can wear it. If ever the administration wants filth to be thrown they get the Senator from Indiana to throw it.

Mr. MINTON. And when Hitler wants it thrown you throw it.

Mr. HOLT. No, no, not at all. I want to say this, that there never has been a time in recent history when the administration wanted some dirty, filthy, low job done, that they could not get the Senator from Indiana to do it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I make the point of order——

Mr. HOLT. Oh, I do not blame the Senator from Kentucky at all——

Mr. BARKLEY. It is a matter of indifference to me whether the Senator from West Virginia blames me or not, but the Senate has rules which require the observance at least of decorum in debate here among Senators, and I suggest to the Chair that the language used by the Senator from West Virginia is not in keeping with the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I want the Senate to know——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has made a point of order.

Mr. HOLT. I want to talk on that point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky, under the rule, has the right to make a point of order.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest that the Senator from West Virginia impugns the motives of the Senator from Indiana. He said in effect that the Senator from Indiana can be obtained by the administration, or some other agency, to deal in low, dirty, contemptible debate here, and to reflect upon Senators. If that is not a violation of the rule which prohibits the impugning of motives of Senators, I should like to have the rule read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read for the information of the Senate paragraph 4 of rule XIX.

The CHIEF CLERK. Rule XIX, paragraph 4:

> If any Senator, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall, or any Senator may, call him to order; and when a Senator shall be called to order he shall sit down, and not proceed without leave of the Senate, which, if granted, shall be upon motion that he be allowed to proceed in order, which motion shall be determined without debate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under that rule the Chair, or any Senator, may call the Senate's attention to the language of a Senator. I have no desire to prevent the Senator from West Virginia or any other Senator proceeding in debate, but I do question the propriety of language such as the Senator from West Virginia has used toward the Senator from Indiana, and I ask the Chair to decide whether it is a violation of the rule of the Senate against impugning the motives of another Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would place the Chair in the position of passing upon the language used by the Senator from West Virginia. The Senator from Kentucky in rising to make the point of order is wholly within his rights, and under rule XIX it would be in order for the Senate, upon motion, to allow the Senator from West Virginia to proceed in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think, under the rule, it is no more the duty of a Senator than of the Chair to call a Senator to order when he violates the rule, but I am willing to assume responsibility for calling attention to the language of the Senator from West Virginia. When a Senator is called to order he shall sit down, and not proceed without leave of the Senate. I am willing to make the motion, and do make the motion, that he be allowed to proceed in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky that the Senator from West Virginia proceed in order. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the Senator from West Virginia is recognized to proceed in order.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has attacked my father. My father is dead. He cannot protect himself. My father was a patriot, and enlisted in the Civil War when he was 13 years of age; and yet the Senator from Indiana stands up and impugns his motives. My father will be long remembered as a man who stood courageously for the things in which he believed. Yes, my father was against the World War; and thousands of American boys would be alive today if my father's course had been upheld by the American people. Yes; my father was against war, because he had seen it. He had seen boys of his own age, 14 and 15 years of age, killed on the battlefield, and he did not want any more boys to be killed.

Likewise, I say that America gained nothing from her entrance into the World War. My father was against it, but he was against it openly. The Senator from Indiana says that my distinguished father—and pray God that I may be as much of a man as my father was—opposed sending food to the soldiers abroad. While my father was against the war, he never opposed raising food to send to the soldiers abroad.

Where did such testimony come from? It came from the words of a man who was superintendent of schools in my town, and who was later appointed by the President to smack at me. What did that man do? When I was a child 12 years old in school, what did this man who attacked my father before the committee do? He came before the students of my own school, before me, a child 12 years old, with no defense at all, and said "Old Doc Holt"—my father was a physician, and a good one—"ought to be lined up against a wall and shot until his blood stained the wall." He made that statement before the student group, and before me, 12 years of age. The testimony is based on that type of statement, brought about by war hysteria. Yes; my father was against the war, and he was right.

The story about my brother not being in the Army is another malicious misstatement of fact. My brother did not seek to evade the draft, as the Senator from Indiana has tried to intimate. Mr. President, I shall ask that there be placed in the RECORD—I shall send home immediately for it—a letter from the War Department praising my brother for his work in construction of military camps. He served at Camp Sherman. He served at Camp Upton, and he served at other camps in America. It is typical of the Senator from Indiana to rise in the Senate, where my brother has no protection, and deliberately try to smear me.

Mr. President, I expected just such an attack. Whenever a man stands up and fights this crowd, he is smeared. I have had this experience before. I ask that I be permitted to place in the RECORD the military record of the Holts. There has been a Holt in every war in American history. Holts were in the Revolutionary War, and fought to make America independent from England. The Senator from Indiana does not think we are free today. He still thinks we are a colony.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from West Virginia will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOLT. It is impossible to list, on the spur of the moment, all of my direct relatives who have served in the Army and Navy. They served in the Indian wars, Revolutionary War, War of 1812, Civil War, and the World War.

Here are my grandparents and uncles who have served in the Army and Navy:

Joseph Davis, lieutenant in Revolutionary War.
Joseph Davis (son of above mentioned), surgeon in Revolutionary War.
Reuben Davis, ensign in the War of 1812.
Jacob Pritchard, major of militia.
William Henry Harrison Dew, surgeon in Confederate Army.
Samuel Dew, served in Confederate Army. Killed in action at Frederick, Md.
William Dew, served as captain from Virginia in Revolutionary War.
John Holt, served in militia during Whisky Rebellion.
William Holt, died in Union Army during Civil War.
John Holt, served in Union Army during Civil War.
Dr. James McCauley, surgeon in United States Navy.
Jonathan Cobun (Fort Cobun named for him), served in Indian wars.
James Cobun, served in Indian wars.
Robert Edwards, Revolutionary War captain.
Thomas Highland, captain.
Gen. William Holt, quartermaster general under Gen. George Washington in Revolutionary War.
Dr. M. S. Holt (father) enlisted in Union Army in Civil War.
Mathew S. Holt, Jr. (brother) served in construction division, United States Army, World War.
Other information as to age of some who were not able to serve in Army or Navy:
My father was but 13 years of age but enlisted.
My grandfather Dew was but 15 years of age at the start of Civil War.
Another grandfather Dew was but 7 years of age when Revolutionary War began but later enlisted in militia upon becoming of age.
No uncles or grandparents were of military age for service in Spanish-American War.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I should like to have the RECORD show these things once and for all.

My fine mother was also against war, because she did not want boys killed; and she was right. My fine mother was knocked down by stones thrown by brave, hysterical patriots. Yes; I know something of war hysteria, because my father was honest and brave enough to stand up and face it. Twice afterward he was elected mayor of my home city by having his name written in on the ballot. He received more votes than both other candidates combined. My father is dead. I hate to say that. But his memory goes on, in protest against needless bloodshed. I am not ashamed of my father's record, and I am not ashamed of my brother's record. I am not ashamed of the Holts. I wish to say to the Senator from Indiana that if he had a spark of manhood about him he would look up these facts and apologize in the United States Senate; but he dare not do so.

The Holts fought in the wars, and many of them died in the wars. The record which I shall present to the Senate will show that. My father was against the World War, and I am against this war, because I know that the same path which we took in 1916 and 1917 is being taken in 1939 and 1940.

The Senator from Indiana said that when Hitler wanted to smear he had me do it. That reminds me of the same sort of abuse which was heaped upon that great American, the elder Senator La Follette from Wisconsin, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I can find almost the identical words in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I have accepted nothing from anybody. My duty is not to any other country but to America. I believe in national defense, but I do not want the boys of my home city sacrificed on the battlefield in order to provide wealth for a few. The Holt family has never been a slacker family; but, thank God, they have enough "guts" to say what they believe, even though they be alone in saying it. I shall do so here, even though I be alone. I shall fight for things that are right.

Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Indiana is uncalled for. Nothing was said in my statement which included the Senator from Indiana, but he seemed to want to include himself. The shoe seemed to fit him, and he put it on and went to town with it.

I am not ashamed of the Holts. I am for America. Thank God, we can still talk, and I intend to do so.

ACTIVE SERVICE OF NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVE, AND RETIRED PERSONNEL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of Reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, several distinguished lawyers who are Members of the Senate have questioned the constitutionality of the pending measure. I raised the same question in the early stages of the measure; but the result of my own research and of the help I have had from others who have specialized in the matter of legislation for national defense is that I am persuaded that the Congress possesses the power which is undertaken to be exercised, first, under and by virtue of inherent sovereignty, and, second, under the express authorities which are laid down in article I, section 8, of the Constitution.

The most general power is that to provide for the common defense. Probably no power which Congress possesses is superior to the power to provide for the common defense. But the Constitution is more specific than that. It vests in the Congress another sovereign power, namely, the power to raise and support armies. There are numerous additional powers which bolster this general and this specific power.

It was by virtue of these powers that Congress heretofore, in 1916 and again in 1933, undertook to include in the Military Establishment of the United States Reserve components. The democratic theory of our Government is that we shall have a relatively small standing Army and that we shall have a relatively large reservoir of trained citizens qualified physically and mentally to answer a call to arms in the common defense. Congress has adhered to that policy in setting up the law under which we work today.

I believe it was the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] who called attention to the power to call out and the power to order into the Federal service the National Guard and other Reserve components of the Military Establishment. I need not review the fact that the Military Establishment consists not only of the standing Army but also of the Reserve components, which include the National Guard of the United States, and the National Guard when called into the service of the United States, which are two different organizations, the Organized Reserve, and the militia when organized.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator from Vermont whether the constitutional authorization giving Congress the power to raise and support armies is not based on something even more fundamental, if there could be anything more fundamental, and that is the power of the Government to preserve itself?

Mr. AUSTIN. Exactly. There is not a more necessary power for a government to have than the power to raise and support armies for the common defense. Section 111 of the National Defense Act, which is found at page 160, 48 Statutes, is an exercise of that power applied to the very same thing the Congress is asked to apply it to today. Is there any question in the mind of Senators that section 111, which enables the President to order into active service the Reserve components of the Army on two conditions is a constitutional and valid piece of legislation? Does any Senator question the validity of that act of Congress which provides, in effect, that the President may order into active service the National Guard of the United States on two conditions, namely, that, first, Congress shall have declared an emergency to exist, and, secondly, that Congress shall have declared that the standing Army is not adequate for the emergency? When once it is admitted that that is a valid exercise of this great power to provide for the common defense and raise and support armies, then the necessary step has been taken to come to the conclusion to which I shall ask the Senate to come.

What is the nature of the pending joint resolution? Is it any different in character than the National Defense Act of 1933? No; it is of identical character; it is exactly the same thing; and it deals with the same subject. It has for its objective that lofty purpose of providing for the national defense by raising and supporting armies. How does the pending joint resolution differ from the existing law, which is, of course, nothing but a statute, and no one here now questions its validity from a constitutional point of view, and I doubt if anyone ever will question it. The joint resolution we are considering changes the power of the President to some extent. Under the existing law it is necessary for the Congress to make certain declarations of fact, namely, that an emergency exists, and that the standing Army is not adequate to take care of it, whereas the joint resolution which we are considering, in effect, repeals that provision, and, in effect, makes it inapplicable to the situation. If the Congress sees fit to pass the joint resolution, then it will not be necessary for the Congress to declare an emergency to exist and that the standing Army is inadequate to meet it. Under the joint resolution, which will have exactly the same validity and exactly the same force as the act of 1933, the President during the brief period ending June 30, 1942, will be authorized to order into active service for limited periods of time the Reserve components of the Army without any preliminary finding by Congress of an emergency or the lack or inadequacy of the standing Army. That is all there is to it; it is as simple as it can be.

Mr. President, if anybody questions my own thought on this matter, which they well might do, I would call attention to the thought of another, namely, a district judge of the United States whose decision stands as the law today. It is the decision of a great and dignified court which has never been reversed, so far as I can find, and has never been modified, so far as I can find, and the reasoning which I have attempted to use in arriving at the conclusion I have is similar to that employed by this judge in his opinion to which I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to refer. I shall not undertake to read the entire opinion, and use so much of the valuable time of the Senate as that would require, but I will read certain paragraphs in order that Senators may know the process of the judge's thought not on this measure, of course, not even on the act of 1933, but on the same principle, for it was upon the Conscription Act of 1917 that this decision was rendered.

A man by the name of Stephens was indicted for failure to register under the act of May 18, 1917. He demurred to the indictment, and the court overruled his demurrer, saying, among other things—and I read from page 960 of Two Hundred and Forty-fifth Federal Reporter:

> The power of Congress to raise armies, like the power to declare war, is unconditional, unqualified, and absolute; and Congress is the exclusive judge of the necessity for the exercise of the power and of the means and manner prescribed by it for its exercise. The constitutional provisions relating to the militia manifestly apply to State militia in contradistinction to militia of the United States. Otherwse it would be difficult to understand the provision "reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." Further, the clause providing for "calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions" is predicated upon the organization of the militia, without which the ends intended could not be attained.

Note in passing that these are the grounds urged now in questioning the validity of this proposal. I resume the reading:

> The provisions of the Constitution relating to the militia having application only to the organized State militia, it does not follow, from the lack of power in Congress to send such militia to fight in a foreign country, that Congress has not power to organize the militia of the United States and send it to any part of the globe deemed best for the conduct of military operations. There is no necessary or logical connection between the two propositions.

Mr. President, I shall not weary the Senate by reading further, but I ask unanimous consent that from this point forward until the mark I have made on the following page be inserted in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> The militia of the United States, as defined in the act of June 3, 1916, is sufficiently inclusive to embrace most, if not all, of the individuals composing the militia, organized or unorganized, of the several States. But should they by conscription be drafted into an army destined for foreign parts they would necessarily lose the character of organized State militia, and the implied constitutional inhibition against calling out the organized State militia except to "execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions" would cease to apply. The power of Congress to declare war and raise armies is absolute and paramount, and must be recognized, even if the exercise of the power interferes with the organization of the State militia in such manner as to leave no subject to which the inhibition can apply. That power infinitely transcends, in importance, the retention of organization of State militia with the result that it can be used for no useful purpose, except the accomplishment of the three specified objects within or substantially within the national domain.
> War was formally declared by the United States against Germany April 6, 1917. The joint resolution containing the declaration sets forth:
> "That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States."
> Under these circumstances, the position taken on the part of the defendant that, although an able-bodied American citizen of proper age, he has not given his consent and, therefore, cannot be compelled to serve his country in a foreign field, or submit to registration, cannot be maintained. That the exercise of the constitutional power to raise armies should be dependent upon the consent of the proposed soldiers is a startling proposition which this court is not prepared to accept. In Angelus v. Sullivan (246 Fed. 54, — C. C. A. —) the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit said with respect to the act in question:
> "This Court has no doubt as to the constitutionality of the act of Congress. The Constitution, Article I, paragraph 8, expressly provides that the Congress shall have power to raise and support armies, and to provide and maintain a navy, and to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces. The purpose of the Conscription Act is to raise an army, and the right to raise it does not involve the exercise of an implied power but of one expressly granted. How can the courts deny to Congress a right which the Constitution in plain and distinct terms confers upon it? The Constitution in conferring the power upon Congress has not prescribed the mode in which the power shall be exercised. The power is conferred fully, completely, and unconditionally. It is for the Congress to determine the means by which the army shall be raised. It is left to its judgment whether it shall be raised by calling for volunteers, or whether it shall be raised by conscription. At the time the Constitution was adopted conscription was not an unknown mode of raising armies, but had been resorted to by governments throughout the world. * * * If it had been intended that Congress should not have the power to raise anything but a volunteer army the grant of power would have been restricted and not made unconditional."

I am satisfied that Congress under the power to declare war, to raise armies, and do all things necessary and proper for the execution of that power, has full constitutional authority by conscription to organize the militia of the United States for foreign warfare, and, as incident to the exercise of that authority, to provide for and enforce the registration of those liable to serve. Further, it does not appear that the army the Government is engaged in raising may not be used to "execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," as well as to serve abroad; and it is not denied that for the former purposes the militia of the United States may be compelled to register and render military service.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I do not adopt the language of that decision, but I do agree with the principle which is so well stated there; and I am persuaded that the Congress has complete authority to enact this joint resolution in the interest of the common defense and for the purpose of providing an army.

Now, Mr. President, if it is in order to do so, I should like to offer an amendment to the amendment which is now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the clerk state the committee amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, after line 17, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 3. (a) Any person so ordered into the active military service of the United States who, in the judgment of those in authority over him, satisfactorily completes the period of service required under this joint resolution shall be entitled to a certificate to that effect upon the completion of such period of service, which shall include a record of any special proficiency or merit attained.

(b) In the case of any person who by reason of being ordered into such active military service is required to leave a position, other than a temporary position, in the employ of any employer and who (1) receives such certificate of satisfactory service, (2) is still qualified to perform the duties of such position, and (3) makes application for reemployment within 40 days after he is relieved from such service—

(A) if such position was in the employ of the United States Government, its Territories or possessions, or the District of Columbia, such person shall be restored to such position or to a position of like status and pay;

(B) if such position was in the employ of a private employer, such employer shall restore such person to such position or to a position of like status and pay unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so;

(C) if such position was in the employ of any State or political subdivision thereof, it is hereby declared to be the sense of the Congress that such person should be restored to such position or to a position of like status and pay.

(c) Any person who is restored to a position in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs (A) or (B) of subsection (b) shall be so restored without loss of seniority, insurance participation or benefits, or other benefits, and such person shall not be discharged from such position without cause within 1 year after such restoration.

(d) The failure or refusal of any private employer to comply with the provisions of paragraph (B) of subsection (b) or with the provisions of subsection (c) shall be an unfair labor practice within the meaning of and for all the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act.

(e) In any case in which no remedy is available under the National Labor Relations Act to require compliance by any private employer with the provisions of this section, the district court of the United States for the district in which such employer maintains a place of business shall have power, upon the filing of a motion, petition, or other appropriate pleading by the person entitled to the benefits of such provisions, to specifically require such employer to comply with such provisions. The court shall order a speedy hearing in any such case and shall advance it on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 18, after the word "Any", it is proposed to insert "member of any reserve component of the land or naval forces who is on active duty, and any"; and on page 2, line 25, it is proposed to strike out the words "any person who" and insert in lieu thereof "any such person who has left a position or."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the desire of the Senator from Vermont to have the two amendments considered together?

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to have that done, because they constitute one amendment in fact, although they happen to occur at two places in the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am not sure that I understood the Senator's amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For the information of the Senate, the clerk will again state the amendment.

Mr. HILL. I am not asking that it be restated. I do not know that even a reading of the language would tell us exactly the scope of the amendment. Will the Senator explain his amendment?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will explain the effect of it.

If agreed to, this amendment would accord to members of the reserve components who have offered their service to the country, or who have been taken into active duty with their consent, the same status that is accorded to conscripts by the amendment. If this amendment should not be agreed to, the conscript or enrollee under the conscription provision and under the order would have a status not granted to the men who volunteer their services or who are now already in extended active service with their consent. Of course, it is an equitable thing to do, and from the point of view of patriotism it is a worthy thing to do.

This amendment relates to the employment—that is, the jobs—from which the enrollee or conscript or person ordered is taken, and makes as good provision as the committee thought could be made and was practicable for assuring the return of these boys to the jobs which they are called upon to leave when they go into the service of their country under this joint resolution.

This is exactly the same amendment which was offered by me in committee yesterday, I believe, and accepted as a part of the corresponding labor provision of the conscription bill. So far as I know, there is no difference at all except in a matter of text which I cannot remember. It seems to me there was a slight change, but it is not seriously material. In other words, it is the aim of the amendment to treat alike all those who serve their country in both the land and the naval forces of the country.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator is speaking for the committee, is he not?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I have not any right to speak for the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought we authorized the Senator to do so.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have not any right to speak for the committee. Our very able chairman may have something to say about this amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, if the Senator will permit me, the amendment is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator answer a question, please? When he refers to reserve components, as he just did, does he not mean the National Guard, the Reserve, and the retired personnel who are referred to seriatim in lines 8 and 9 on page 2?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; but that is not in detail. That is intended to indicate, I believe, the National Guard of the United States, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Organized Reserves, and the Enlisted Reserve Corps.

Mr. DANAHER. So the Senator's use of the term "reserve component" actually is broader than the language appearing on page 2 at line 8?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not think it should be so construed. I think the joint resolution, where it uses the word "reserve," should be construed to include all reserve components.

Mr. DANAHER. I simply wish to make sure that the Senator's amendment does reach all the personnel referred to in section 1 of the joint resolution.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is my intention, and I think the language does cover it all.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. AUSTIN subsequently said: Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a moment. I ask unanimous consent to have placed in the body of the RECORD, following my remarks made today, excerpts from the opinions of the Supreme Court in two cases.

The first is the selective draft law cases, which appear in two hundred and forty-five United States Reports, at page 366. I wish to have printed in the RECORD only those parts which are marked. Some of them are in the argument, at pages 371 and following, and the others are in the opinion by Mr. Chief Justice White, on pages 375 and following.

The other case is in the same volume, at page 481, and is entitled, "Ruthenberg et al. Against United States."

Both these cases, of course, are on draft laws, but they deal with the same principle, among other principles, which is involved in the question raised about the pending joint resolution.

Mr. President, I hope before we adjourn we may have a vote upon the pending amendment, for I understand there is not a single opponent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I shall have no objection if I may be permitted to insert at the conclusion of the able Senator's remarks some excerpts from the speech of Daniel Webster against conscription.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let us first dispose of the request of the Senator from Vermont. Is there objection?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to object?

Mr. REYNOLDS. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the excerpts may be printed in the RECORD.

The excerpts are as follows:

SELECTIVE DRAFT LAW CASES

[From the Argument for the United States]

There is not, as asserted, any common-law right of a soldier not to be sent out of the country.

* * * * * * *

The act infringes no provision of the Constitution concerning the militia. The fact that a citizen is a militiaman does not exempt him from service in the National Army. The militia and the National Army are separate institutions, created for separate purposes; and the power of Congress over the former (art. I, sec. 8, clauses 15, 16) is not in limitation but in extension of the power to raise armies (clause 12). The law infringes no reserved right of the States over the militia. If there be a conflict between the State and Federal powers in this respect, the latter must prevail (Ex parte Coupland (26 Tex. 386, 396, 402); Burroughs v. Peyton (16 Gratt. 470, 475, 483–485); Jeffers v. Fair (33 Ga. 347, 351, 353); Ex parte Tate (39 Ala. 254, 288); Ex parte Bolling (id., 609); Barber v. Irwin (34 Ga. 27, 37); Simmons v. Miller (40 Miss. 19, 26); Kneedler v. Lane, supra). Otherwise the power of Congress to raise armies must be nullified. But there is no conflict in fact. The National Government has never impaired the right of the States to keep up the militia. The present law draws into the National Army but a small portion of the militia as a whole, and the withdrawal from possible call for local service is only temporary (act of June 15, 1917, sec. 4, 40 Stat. 217). The right of the States to organize and train militia remaining has been recognized and safeguarded (act of June 14, 1917; 40 Stat. 181; National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, sec. 61, 39 Stat. 198). The restrictions of the militia clause are inapplicable. The draft is not based on liability to perform militia duty, but on liability of citizens to render national military service. When Congress has made provision for calling the militia in the past, the words have been addressed to the militia expressly (citing numerous Federal acts). The opposing briefs are in conflict as to whether this act calls the militia. The National Defense Act of 1916, in designating all able-bodied male citizens between the ages of 18 and 45 as militiamen, does not call them to militia service, and clearly does not intend to relinquish the power to call citizens into the National Army. The Draft Act does not call the National Guard in its organized form, but operates upon the individuals, for reorganization in national units. Thus, to select the trained members of the National Guard from the body of citizenship is not arbitrary, but reasonable and prudent. However, even if plaintiffs in error were called as militiamen, they would not be entitled to relief in the courts (Martin v. Mott, supra; Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1, 44).

[From the Opinion of the Court]

The act proposed to raise a national Army, first, by increasing the regular force to its maximum strength and there maintaining it; second, by incorporating into such Army the members of the National Guard and National Guard Reserve already in the service of the United States (act of Congress of June 3, 1916, c. 134, 39 Stat. 211) and maintaining their organizations to their full strength.

* * * * * * *

The proclamation of the President calling the persons designated within the ages described in the statute was made, and the plaintiffs in error, who were in the class and under the statute were obliged to present themselves for registration and subject themselves to the law, failed to do so and were prosecuted under the statute for the penalties for which it provided.

* * * * * * *

But the proposition simply denies to Congress the power to raise armies which the Constitution gives. That power by the very terms of the Constitution, being delegated, is supreme (article VI). In truth the contention simply assails the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution in conferring authority on Congress and in not retaining it as it was under the Confederation in the several States.

* * * * * * *

It may not be doubted that the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need and the right to compel it.

* * * * * * *

When the Constitution came to be formed it may not be disputed that one of the recognized necessities for its adoption was the want of power in Congress to raise an army and the dependence upon the States for their quotas. In supplying the power it was manifestly intended to give it all and leave none to the States, since besides the delegation to Congress of authority to raise armies the Constitution prohibited the States, without the consent of Congress, from keeping troops in time of peace or engaging in war. Article I, § 10.

* * * * * * *

There was left therefore under the sway of the States undelegated the control of the militia to the extent that such control was not taken away by the exercise by Congress of its power to raise armies. This did not diminish the military power or curb the full potentiality of the right to exert it but left an area of authority requiring to be provided for (the militia area) unless and until by the exertion of the military power of Congress that area had been circumscribed or totally disappeared. This, therefore, is what was dealt with by the militia provision. It diminished the occasion for the exertion by Congress of its military power beyond the strict necessities for its exercise by giving the power to Congress to direct the organization and training of the militia (evidently to prepare such militia in the event of the exercise of the Army power) although leaving the carrying out of such command to the States. It further conduced to the same result by delegating to Congress the right to call on occasions which were specified for the militia force, thus again obviating the necessity for exercising the Army power to the extent of being ready for every conceivable contingency. This purpose is made manifest by the provision preserving the organization of the militia so far as formed when called for such special purposes although subjecting the militia when so called to the paramount authority of the United States (Tarble's case, 13 Wallace, 397, 408). But because under the express regulations the power was given to call for specified purposes without exerting the Army power, it cannot follow that the latter power when exerted was not complete to the extent of its exertion and dominant. Because the power of Congress to raise armies was not required to be exerted to its full limit but only as in the discretion of Congress it was deemed the public interest required, furnishes no ground for supposing that the complete power was lost by its partial exertion. Because, moreover, the power granted to Congress to raise armies in its potentiality was susceptible of narrowing the area over which the militia clause operated, affords no ground for confounding the two areas which were distinct and separate to the end of confusing both the powers and thus weakening or destroying both.

RUTHENBERG ET AL. VS. UNITED STATES

As every contention made in this case concerning the unconstitutionality of the selective draft law was urged in Arver v. United States (Selective draft law cases), ante, 366, and held to be without merit, that subject may be put out of view. The remaining assignments of error are to say the least highly technical, and require only the briefest notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request made by the Senator from Minnesota?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DANIEL WEBSTER ON UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF CONSCRIPTION

Congress having, by the Constitution, a power to raise armies, the Secretary contends that no restraint is to be imposed on the exercise of this power, except such as is expressly stated in the written letter of the instrument. In other words, that Congress may execute its powers, by any means it chooses, unless such means are particularly prohibited. But the general nature and object of the Constitution impose as rigid a restriction on the means of exercising power as could be done by the most explicit injunctions. It is the first principle applicable to such a case, that no construction shall be admitted which impairs the general nature and character of the instrument. A free constitution of government is to be construed upon free principles, and every branch of its provisions is to receive such an interpretation as is full of its general spirit. No means are to be taken by implication which would strike us absurdly if expressed. And what would have been more absurd than for this Constitution to have said that to secure the great blessings of liberty it gave to government an uncontrolled power of military conscription? Yet such is the absurdity which it is made to exhibit, under the commentary of the Secretary of War.

But it is said that it might happen that an army could not be raised by voluntary enlistment, in which case the power to raise armies would be granted in vain, unless they might be raised by compulsion. If this reasoning could prove anything, it would equally show that whenever the legitimate power of the Constitution should be so badly administered as to cease to answer the great ends intended by them such new powers may be assumed or usurped as any existing administration may deem expedient. This is the result of his own reasoning, to which the Secretary does not profess to go. But it is a true result. For if it is to be assumed that all powers were granted which might by possibility become necessary, and that government itself is the judge of this possible necessity, then the powers of government are precisely what it chooses they should be. Apply the same reasoning to any other power granted to Congress and test its accuracy by the result. Congress has power to borrow money. How is it to exercise this power? Is it confined to voluntary loans? There is no express limitation to that effect, and, in the language of the Secretary, it might happen—indeed, it has happened—that persons could not be found willing to lend. Money might be borrowed then in any other mode. In other words, Congress might resort to a forced loan. It might take the money of any man by force and give him in exchange exchequer notes or certificates of stock. Would this be quite constitutional, sir? It is entirely within the reasoning of the Secretary, and it is a result of his argument, outraging the rights of individuals in a far less degree than the practical consequences which he himself draws from it. A compulsory loan is not to be compared in point of enormity with a compulsory military service.

If the Secretary of War has proved the right of Congress to enact a law enforcing a draft of men out of the militia into the Regular Army, he will at any time be able to prove quite as clearly that Congress has power to create a dictator. The arguments which have helped him in one case will equally aid him in the other, the same reason of a supposed or possible state necessity which is urged now may be repeated therein with equal pertinency and effect.

Sir, in granting Congress the power to raise armies the people have granted all the means which are ordinary and usual and which are consistent with the liberties and security of the people themselves, and they have granted no others. To talk about the unlimited power of the Government over the means to execute its authority, is to hold a language which is true only in regard to despotism. The tyranny of arbitrary governments consists as much in its means as in its ends, and it would be a ridiculous and absurd Constitution which should be less cautious to guard against abuses in the one case than in the other. All the means and instruments which a free government exercises, as well as the ends and objects which it pursues, are to partake of its own essential character and to be conformed to its genuine spirit. A free government with arbitrary means to administer it is a contradiction; a free government without adequate provision for personal security is an absurdity; a free government with an uncontrolled power of military conscription is a solecism, at once the most ridiculous and abominable that ever entered into the head of man.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the statement was made on the floor of the Senate on yesterday—at least, I read it in one of the newspapers—that Colonel Lindbergh was one of the "fifth columnists," or something of that kind, because of certain statements which he made in a speech in the city of Chicago.

I have just received a statement which was published by William Allen White in 1938 in the Emporia Gazette. I do not think anybody will say that William Allen White is a "fifth columnist." I have known Mr. White for a good many years. He is now the head of the movement that has placed advertisements in the newspapers saying, "Stop Hitler Now." I think it is extremely unfortunate if persons who disagree with one another, either in the Senate or outside of the Senate, are immediately accused of being "fifth columnists" or something of the kind.

The conscription bill which is now pending will lead to honest differences of opinion between persons who are equally patriotic. I happen to be one of those who disagree with conscription in peacetime; and when I take that stand I am taking the same stand that has been taken by the people of this country for 150 years.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not care to argue with the Senator. The Senator says he is against conscription in peacetime.

Mr. WHEELER. Exactly.

Mr. CONNALLY. He would be for it in wartime?

Mr. WHEELER. If it should be necessary; yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator would be for it in wartime but he is against it in peacetime?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is there any difference between calling out troops when the danger is so emergent that it is necessary to have them right now, and calling them out a little earlier for the same purpose, to train them and equip them so that the danger will not be so great? I cannot comprehend the reasoning of the Senator as to its being sound to call them out in time of war but unsound to call them out in time of peace.

Mr. WHEELER. I think there is a vast difference. In the first place, I am not finding fault with anybody who disagrees with me on this question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not quarreling with the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand that. I am not finding fault with Senators who believe Mr. Hitler is going to come over and take the United States tomorrow, or that he is going to take Mexico, or that he is going to take South America. I do not believe it, and I do not think there is any warrant for that fear. Nevertheless, there are men who honestly believe that. I do not think there is anything of that kind to fear. Some Senators and some other persons believe that a grave danger of invasion faces us, and that if England should happen to be defeated we would be immediately attacked. I do not subscribe to that view.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Montana that I do not base my views on the imminent danger of any particular contingency of that kind occurring; but I think the national interest requires that even as to a remote possibility we ought to be prepared, so that it would not occur either as to Hitler or Japan or England or any other possible enemy. I think it is the duty of the National Government, and those of us who have a small part in running it, so to arm and equip and train the military land and naval forces that it will not be a question of whether some master wills to come over here or wills not to do so, but it will be a question that he dare not come; he dare not will it.

Mr. WHEELER. I subscribe to the Senator's views with reference to that. I feel that we should be prepared to meet any eventuality. But when we come to conscription in peacetime, in my humble judgment, we are acting contrary to every principle we have heretofore followed in this country. If we can and do conscript the lives of people in peacetime, then, of course, we should also conscript the wealth of the country. When we conscript lives and conscript wealth, then we are well on our way to the type of totalitarian governments from which we seek to protect ourselves.

There are men in this country, and possibly men in the Senate, who feel that in order to protect this country, not only from the military standpoint but from the economic standpoint, it is necessary to temporarily set up some form of dictatorship in order to compete with totalitarian governments. I do not subscribe to that view. I have never known of a dictator in the world who ever got his dictatorship, however temporary it was to be, who ever gave it up. That is not the history of people who get that kind of power, and it is not going to be so in this country, if we ever come to that. But the Senator and I do not disagree in the view that we should have a defense program carried out in a business-like, calm, cool way to meet any eventuality. We do disagree, I understand, on the question of conscription.

But I did not rise to get into an argument at this time with reference to that particular feature. I did rise to say that I think it is extremely unfortunate if we are to lather the people into hysteria. As the Senator from Connecticut said yesterday, in offering his proposed substitute, the most important thing in connection with national defense is to have national unity, and we are not going to have national unity if we are to make hysterical statements and accuse everyone who does not agree with us of being a "fifth columnist," and if we are going to see "fifth columnists" in every corner. It is not going to do any good to call people of the type of Colonel Lindbergh "fifth columnists." I never met Colonel Lindbergh except on one occasion, and then only for a brief, passing moment, so I do not know much about him personally, but I cannot conceive that he is guided by any other motive than that of patriotism.

If Colonel Lindbergh is a "fifth columnist" because of what he said in Chicago, then William Allen White, because of what he said in 1938, is likewise a "fifth columnist." Lindbergh did not go any further in his statement, as I read it, than William Allen White went in 1938. Let me read from Mr. White's statement:

Nineteen years ago this winter, the writer of these lines was in Paris. He was reporting for a syndicate of American newspapers with a combined circulation of something like 2,000,000, the doings of the peace conference which drew up the Treaty of Versailles. It was a terrible treaty. It penalized Germany beyond human endurance. It humiliated her, and it imposed a financial burden upon the vanquished that was out of all reason. That treaty was merely a declaration of the next war. The readers of the Gazette may remember that the editor, in his syndicated articles, which were printed herein, protested against the iniquity of the treaty, not chiefly as a moral wrong, but as a chunk of dynamite which would blow peace out of the world and bring inevitable war.

CONSEQUENCES INEVITABLE

It was not his own wisdom that guided the typewriter in those days. A large minority of onlookers at the treaty making—reporters, minority statesmen, and businessmen—were shocked and alarmed. Being practical men they were more alarmed than shocked, possibly, at the catastrophic consequences looming up inevitably ahead of that treaty. The consequences are here now. The trouble started 10 years ago when the economic world began to blow up, and the economic phases of the treaty were abandoned. If these punitive treaty provisions had not been written we should have had no depression, no world panic. If the political phases of the treaty had not been written we should have today, no Hitler, no threat of war beclouding the world.

With all the evils of this calamitous crime before the eyes of the men who made that treaty, why did they do it? Three men, primarily, were responsible. Each reflected a greed of his own home group.

He included in that Clemenceau, Lloyd George, and Woodrow Wilson. I do not agree with what he said about Mr. Wilson.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator explain what Mr. White said about President Wilson?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. He spoke of greed. What did we get out of the war?

Mr. WHEELER. We got nothing.

Mr. CONNALLY. We did not get a dollar, did not get an inch of territory, did not get a new subject, or a new citizen. If Mr. White said anything like that, he permitted his partisanship and hatred of Wilson to cause him to make a statement that was not true, and I regret it, because I like Mr. White.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator wholeheartedly in that statement. Mr. White said:

Each reflected a greed of his own home group: Clemenceau, Lloyd George, and Woodrow Wilson. Clemenceau and the French, including their central European allies, wanted the German colonies and wanted Germany bound and chained. Lloyd George and his group wanted colonies and wanted Germany to pay England for the British cost of the war. Woodrow Wilson, representing America, wanted no colonies, demanded from Germany no punitive reparations. He wanted the League of Nations. But, alas, with a folly that was as stupendous as his vision of the League of Nations was noble, Woodrow Wilson tied that noble vision to the vengeful treaty. And so it was that the League of Nations—his high vision—crumbled because of his greed for the power of his pet project. It was a day of vengeance and greed. But evil carries its own punishment. So "vengeance is mine, saith the Lord; I will repay." Human vengeance is the most expensive of all the lusts of man. It is a greed in itself, and greed always eats its own vitals in the end.

ONLY ONE SOLUTION

Hitler is the personification in reverse. What can save the world? More greeds? No. They will only aggravate the trouble. The hardest thing in the world to do today will be to turn the right way, to the only solution that is possible, the only thing that will save this civilization which we call Christendom, in the main, the white man's civilization from the Caspian Sea westward to Honolulu. The saving grace that will rescue civilization is a humble and a contrite heart; that is "the way and the truth and the life." The Allies still have their opportunity. They have tried force when Germany surrendered. Force has failed. They can turn to reason if they have the wisdom to do so. But now the appeal to arms will be futile. For no one ever won any war, and no one will win this new war when it starts. The present economic, political, and moral order will fall under the impact of another war. If we are to save our democratic civilization, we should get it into our democratic heads and hearts as practical men that we have only one Saviour; one real, practical, common-sense Redeemer. And that is the philosophy, the precepts, and the guiding morals of Jesus of Nazareth. Not to the leaders, not to the statesmen, not to the businessmen with their self-interest should the democracies of the world turn today. But on their marrow bones they should pray for the wisdom and the strength of the humble, for the guidance of the great mind that preached the great Sermon on the Mount: "Do unto others as ye would have them do unto you"—the second Sinai of man.

This was William Allen White speaking. While I differ with him with reference to his views respecting selling our ships to Great Britain, and on other matters, I believe that he is one of the great men of our day.

I certainly think it is deplorable that during the debates in the Senate there should be bitterness and strife and men should accuse one another or call others names. That will not lead to unity in our Nation.

If someone would rise today and use the same language which Mr. White used, and say that it was the Versailles Treaty which brought about the conditions which exist in this country, immediately someone would say, "You are an appeaser, you are an isolationist, you are a 'fifth columnist,' you are in the pay of Germany." In my judgment, Mr. White is stating the simple facts and the simple truth. That does not change our obligation and it does not affect the necessity for adequate defense to meet any eventuality.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LEE. If the Senator claims that the Versailles Treaty was the justification for Germany's invasion of Belgium and France this time, what was the justification for their invasion some 20 years ago, when there was no Versailles Treaty?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not intend to go into the intricacies of European power politics. Every side and every country in Europe has done a great many things which have been wrong. I hold no brief for the Germans of 1916 and I certainly hold no brief for Mr. Hitler. I think that many of the things he has done are deplorable and despicable. But I do say on the floor of the Senate that two or three things could have happened when the Versailles Treaty was under consideration. A reasonable peace could have been made. I will say that one of the highest authorities in this country, a man whom we all respect, who attended the Versailles peace conference with Woodrow Wilson, told me not later than the first of this year that he pleaded with representatives of England and France to make a peace treaty which would not bring on another war. He said he pointed out to them at that time that the treaty they proposed to impose would only bring on war, but they accused him of being pro-German and pro-Russian. He was ridiculed and called names because he took the position he did.

The time to have stopped Hitler—and this does not excuse him for anything he has done—the time to have stopped Hitler, in my judgment, was when he went into the Ruhr, and if England and France had stopped Hitler at that time he would never have gotten any place today.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. I wish to ask the Senator this question: Were there not many people in those countries who, when some persons counseled that Hitler be stopped, said, "No; that means war"? And they went on to say, "He has the right to rearm Germany. He has the right to go into the Ruhr. That is his territory and we are not going to interfere."

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, the Senator from Florida knows very much more about what was in the minds of the people of England and of France than I do, and I am not prepared to say what was in their minds, but I do say that my understanding of the matter is that France wanted to stop Hitler, but Great Britain did not.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. PEPPER. I will ask the Senator from Montana if that has not been the situation with respect to each progressive step that Hitler has taken? When he entered into the Ruhr and when he took the Rhineland, that question presented itself, and finally, as the Senator from Montana said—and I think the Senator is correct—France, suspecting that there would come a time when they would find they had waited too long, protested, but Great Britain said, "Perhaps we had better let him go along. Perhaps he means what he says. If we will just let him have that, perhaps he will stop." But he did not stop, but took the next step, and finally came the situation with respect to Czechoslovakia. The Senator from Montana knows all about the history of the taking of Czechoslovakia. Some people said then, "If we are ever going to stop Hitler, we had better do so now while the foundries of Czechoslovakia are in operation, while the great Skoda munitions factory is in operation, and Czechoslovakia has a great fine army." But some person suggested, "We cannot fight over that issue." And so it was every time an issue presented itself—that no effort was made to stop him until finally France and Britain became convinced—at least, I assume they became convinced—that Hitler was not trying to repair the damage done by the Versailles Treaty; that he was not trying to right wrongs; but that he was really trying to conquer territory.

The Senator will remember that Mr. Chamberlain, in his speech after he returned from Munich, said:

> If I were convinced that Hitler was trying to dominate the world by force, I would go to war. I think at Berchtesgaden he was not trying to do that. I think at Berchtesgaden he was trying to right the wrongs done by the Versailles Treaty.

Mr. WHEELER. I think what Chamberlain said was true. I think Hitler wanted to right the wrongs done by the Versailles Treaty. Of course, the Senator from Florida will recall that Sir John Simon, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, made a speech in the House of Commons in which he said, "We have to rearm Germany in order to bring peace in Europe." And not only that, but you know and I know that as a matter of fact some of the leading industrialists and financiers in England helped to finance Mr. Hitler. They loaned tremendous amounts of money, something like $2,000,000,000 on short-term credits, and something like $1,000,000,000 in long-term loans. Then it will be recalled that when France wanted to stop Hitler, England refused, and France started calling her loans, and when France started calling in her loans, the British lord, who is the head of the great newspaper syndicate, made a statement in Canada, in his home town, in which he said, "We had to scrape the barrel in order to keep the banks of England from going under" by reason of the calling of the loans which had been made.

I am not anti-British by any manner of means, and I hope and pray that England will hold out, and that Mr. Hitler will be brought to terms. But I also want to keep out of wra, and I want to do nothing which is going to take this country into the war or lead us down the road to war.

The Senator from Florida and I differ, as I said, upon the matter, because from his conversation and his speeches I am quite sure that he feels that we ought to go to the war now in order to stop Hitler.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. No. I made clear my position—if anybody should be interested in what I say—in a speech I made at Harvard University the other day, which was placed in the RECORD. I did go so far as to say that we should give notice to all men that we will resist, insofar as it affects our own security and defense, the conquest of Great Britain. I would not send a single soldier, or airman, or sailor to the continent of Europe. I would not want any part in trying to push Hitler back on any part of the continent of Europe. But I do believe very conscientiously that our security and safety would be interfered with if the British Government—not the British Empire, because I do not care about any element of it—if the British Government ceased to be a first-class power, and if the British Navy were destroyed or seriously impaired, and I would resist that event happening by such force as might be necessary to prevent it, starting off in the first place with letting them have what things they could use themselves for their defense, but if it came to be an eventual question, as I think the Senate is going to have to face it, as to whether we will do anything to aid in the defense of Great Britain as a part of our own security, or let it collapse, I would decide in the affirmative, and I consider myself acting solely in the defense of America in doing it.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Florida that I do not disagree with him. I should hate to see the British Government—not the British Empire, because I do not know enough about it to pass upon that matter—but I would hate to see the British Government collapse. However, I am not willing to go as far as the Senator from Florida is—that is for the United States to go into war in order to keep that from happening.

From the statement which the Senator from Florida has made I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the Senator would take the position that we should declare war if we felt and saw that the British Government would collapse.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. I am afraid I have not always been clear, so that the Senator would understand the distinction I make.

Mr. WHEELER. That is probably my fault.

Mr. PEPPER. No. In no case would I declare war. Declaring war has not a thing in the world to do with it. I have not had the slightest notion of declaring war. I mean by that, that I would simply interpose, along with the defenses that were being interposed by the British people against the attack of the Germans, such force as might be necessary to keep that country from collapsing and being conquered. I would not declare war.

Mr. WHEELER. No; the Senator would simply go to war.

Mr. PEPPER. I would let them have some destroyers, I would let them have some airplanes, and some cruisers, as little as might be necessary, and possible to spare, but I would allow them these instrumentalities, which would be for defense—for their defense and for our defense—to be interposed between their Government and the attack of Hitler and the Germans, but I would not declare war.

Mr. WHEELER. But you would go to war if you took steps which amount to war. I appreciate the fact that today many nations do not declare war; they simply go to war. However, I cannot subscribe to the idea of simply doing everything that has always been considered an act of war. We have always taken the high position in the United States that a treaty meant something, and we have always taken the position in the United States of America that international law meant something. We have talked about it on the floor of the Senate. Candidates for President and Presidents of the United States have talked about it. The Democratic platform has gone on record since 1900 with reference to matters of that kind. I say that we cannot maintain our position before the world if we do the very same things that we have accused countries of doing and for which we have denounced them. That is where the Senator from Florida and I differ with respect to this matter.

Mr. President, I rose not to discuss that particular matter at this time, but I rose because of the statement that the Senator from Florida made. I know that if anybody rises now and says that the Versailles Treaty was responsible for the rise of Hitler, he will be accused of being a "fifth columnist," not alone by fanatics but by many honest and sincere people.

So I rose to call attention to what the man who is leading the propaganda in this country at the present time said about it, and I do not think that even the Senator from Florida would accuse William Allen White of being a "fifth columnist" because of the statement he made. As I say, I have no brief for Colonel Lindbergh or for anybody else; but I plead with Members of the Senate, during these days when we are all more or less worn out, for the sake of the country itself not to rise and accuse everyone who disagrees with them of having some ulterior motive and charge them with being a "fifth columnist." I think that such action belittles and besmirches the Senate of the United States as a body. God knows, in the minds of some unthinking people, the Senate of the United States has sunk to a low level. I do not agree with them; but if we follow such a course during this period many persons will say that because of the actions of one or two thoughtless men we ought to have a dictatorship.

If we go back to what was taking place in Italy before Mr. Mussolini came along—and I was there—and if we go back to Germany before Mr. Hitler came in, and see what was going on there, we can appreciate that dictatorships were possible because those countries were torn asunder with bitterness, hatred, and name-calling. Every liberal who rose to protest against something that was happening was immediately called a Bolshevist or a Communist.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LEE. If Goebbels, the chief of propaganda, had written the speech which Colonel Lindbergh delivered, does the Senator from Montana think he could have done any better job for Hitler than Lindbergh did?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think that is a fair question, and I do not think it is a proper thing of which to accuse Mr. Lindbergh. I have heard part of the speech quoted here, but I have not read the entire speech. I do not think the Senator ought to make such a statement. It might just as well be said that William Allen White is a "fifth columnist" because Goebbels could not have written a better statement than William Allen White's statement in 1938.

Mr. LEE. Was not that before Hitler had bathed Europe with the blood of innocent people?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think so. Almost from the time he came into power Hitler started the persecution of racial and religious groups in his own country. I hate nazi-ism and despise Hitler because of the racial and religious persecutions which he started in Germany. I am opposed to the whispering campaigns which are now going on in this country aimed at stirring up racial and religious hysteria. In my humble judgment, Hitler's program of Nazi Kultur has harmed not only his own country but the entire world. I do not want such things to happen in the United States. However, this is still a free country. We are not at war; and certainly we are entitled to free speech in the United States.

Mr. LEE. That is true.

Mr. WHEELER. It ill becomes any Member of the Senate or the House of Representatives to accuse Mr. Lindbergh of being a "fifth columnist," or of being in the same class as the propaganda minister, Goebbels. I do not know Mr. Lindbergh, and I have not read any of Mr. Goebbels' material.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LEE. Of course, it is possible for a person to be a "fifth columnist" innocently. There are many unconscious carriers of disease germs, but the victim of those disease germs is the victim just the same. A person may be perfectly sincere, but if the effect and result of his activities is to soften America, as other countries were softened before they were destroyed, the effect on this country is the same.

Mr. WHEELER. With reference to softening America, let me say to the Senator, that I do not know of anyone who has been accused of trying to soften America economically any more than has the Senator from Oklahoma. He should be one of the last to talk about softening America, because if there has been one Member of the Senate who has been accused of softening America and trying to do things which would destroy the United States, it has been the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. LEE. I should like to have the Senator be more specific in his charges.

Mr. WHEELER. Every Member of Congress, including myself, who has voted for a great many of the New Deal legislative measures, has been accused of trying to soften the American people. The Senator from Oklahoma, as he well knows, has been one of the most ardent New Dealers in the Senate, and has wanted to go even further than the President of the United States with reference to some social legislation. For that reason I cannot be specific, but I have seen editorials written about the Senator.

Mr. LEE. Because I wanted to prevent war profits, if that is what the Senator means.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; that is one thing.

Mr. LEE. The Senator has agreed with me.

Mr. WHEELER. Exactly. I am not criticizing the Senator for the stand he has taken. I say that he is correct. If we are to conscript the manpower of this country, we must, in justice, conscript capital property.

Mr. LEE. We should. Did not England do so when she became tough?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. I am only pointing out the charges that have been leveled at the Senator.

Mr. LEE. That is not softening. That is getting tough.

Mr. WHEELER. That is not what Dorothy Thompson and some of the other columnists would say about it.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] said yesterday that the period through which we are passing is so utterly confusing as to be bewildering. A few days ago I read something which supports the thesis of the Senator from Wisconsin. I saw a statement attributed to a Wall Street publication which said that the per unit cost of the material we are buying in preparation for national defense is so high, and that prices are rising in such an astounding fashion that the boondoggling of P. W. A. would look like small change in comparison. About that time I ran across another definition from a publicist in America who does a beautiful job. This publicist defined a "fifth columnist." I should like Senators to know what one of the definitions is. He says that a "fifth columnist" is anyone who criticizes the cost of the program. So Senators now have notice served on them that if any Senator has the temerity to rise and object to the cost, he will be classified as a "fifth columnist." I will admit that that is a fantastic theory, but it is given wide currency.

I now make bold to call the attention of the Senator from Montana and other Senators to some comment in yesterday's RECORD. I refer to a colloquy between the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON]—who I assume speaks the views of the administration—and the able Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. It had to do with the purchasing power of the dollar. The Senator from Oklahoma, who is an authority on the subject, said that today the dollar would purchase twice as much as it purchased in 1920. The Senator from Indiana repeated that statement, and said that the purchasing power of the American dollar today is twice what it was in 1920.

As a member of the Naval Affairs Committee of this body I beg to call attention to the fact that in 1920 we were engaged in building the battleship West Virginia, a vessel of approximately 35,000 tons. She cost $26,800,000, at a time when the dollar was buying what it then bought. Today that same type of vessel would cost not less than $70,000,000, at a time when the purchasing power of the American dollar is twice what it was when we were building the West Virginia. If Senators can figure that all out, and add to the computation what is going to happen to the American taxpayer with that fantastic whirlwind of finance, I wish they would enlighten me. I know that the "fifth columnist" who wrote for the Wall Street Journal—or whatever the Wall Street publication was which suggested that all this financial operation would make the boondoggling of P. W. A. look like petty change—probably was mistaken. He did not know that he was a "fifth columnist," but he slipped very easily and gracefully into that category.

This situation merely illustrates how the silly season has come upon us. Distinguished and able Members of the Senate sit around and listen seriously to such talk. A Member of Congress is a "fifth columnist" if he presumes, when he is voting for tax bills, to question whether or not the taxpayers will receive value of 100 cents on the dollar. Able Senators have stated within the past 2 hours that the American dollar today will buy twice what it bought in 1920, and yet we are paying three times as much for battleships as we did at that time. I wish some able Senator could figure it all out. I think the American people are entitled to the answer, and I wish some able Senator would give us the answer.

Mr. WHEELER. In 1920, when we passed the bill providing pay of $21 a month for the enlisted men of the Army, the wages of almost all other classes of workingmen in the United States were on a much higher level than they are today. But the workingmen of this country, through organization, have been able to raise their wages in some instances almost double in the last few years. Nothing, however, has been done to raise the level of pay of the men in the lower grades of the Army.

In connection with the proposal to conscript men, let me call attention to the difference in the way the men themselves are being treated and the way business is being treated. We are proposing to conscript men and say to them, "You have got to serve in the Army." But when it comes to business, it is a different matter. To get business to volunteer and to cooperate with the Government, we are permitting business to say to us "Stop prosecutions under the Sherman antitrust law." Some cases will not be prosecuted under the Sherman antitrust law in order to secure cooperation from business on national-defense items. Then, in addition, to get cooperation from business, the Government is asked to lessen restrictions of the labor acts. And some sections of business are saying, "If you want any help from us, you have got to let us make greater profits." Eight- and ten-percent profit on an order is not enough when business is working for its own Government during an emergency.

On the one hand we are making concessions to business in order to get them to volunteer but we are not giving the boys of America an opportunity to volunteer. We are saying to them, "You have got to come in and take your medicine and you have got to take it at $21 a month." We do not offer them any inducement whatever to volunteer.

In a democracy two things always have been held sacred and inviolate—one the right to vote and the other the right to life. We are not even waiting for war to conscript men. We are saying, "We are going to take away your right to liberty in peacetime; we are not going to give you a chance to volunteer first, but we are clamping down on you and sending you into the ranks."

I did not hear the address of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT] with reference to some of those who are back of the conscription proposal, but I venture the assertion that if it were suggested that their wealth be conscripted they would rise in holy horror and loud protest and say they would not go along with the Government; yet they are willing, nay anxious, to conscript the lives of the boys of the country.

So, in conclusion—and I had not intended to take so long—let me say that I hope we will not start what was started in the World War. This is an example of the sort of rumor and hysteria I deplore. A young man in my home State was reported to have told the story that Belgian children, with their arms off or their legs off, were being exhibited across the country and were going through certain towns in Montana. The young man denied he had ever heard the story, and when he denied it some hysterical people accused him of being pro-German, beat him, and then chased him out of town. That kind of thing is starting in this country, and I hope that the Members of the Senate will not, during the months to come, by their voices and actions, further fan the flames of hysteria. Already anyone who gets up and expresses an opinion contrary to the opinion of someone else is denounced by some, by implication, at least, as being an appeaser—I do not know what is meant by that—or a "fifth columnist."

After all, we are not at war with Hitler. Some think we should be, but we are not. Regardless of how much I may disagree with Colonel Lindbergh and what he may say, he has a right, under the Constitution of the United States, to express his opinion just as any Member of the United States Senate has; and when he does express his opinion it ill becomes Members of the Senate of the United States to denounce him as a "fifth columnist." The same men who denounced him would dislike to be accused of being in the pay of Great Britain because they have taken a favorable attitude toward that country and said they wished to do everything they could for the British Government. If there is any plan of propaganda in the United States it is on the part of the British——

Mr. LEE. Mr. President——

Mr. WHEELER. They have the greatest propaganda organization, and they indulge in propaganda openly and frankly. When their agents come here, they are entertained. I know, as other Senators know, that one of their agents who was here and was entertained by high officials was the man who started the propaganda that we should sell or give to Great Britain 50 of our destroyers.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I will yield to the Senator in a few moments. Suppose some agent of Germany came here and said we ought to sell 50 destroyers to Germany. He would be run out of town or hanged or something of that kind, because it would be said "he is seeking to destroy our Government."

So, I repeat, we are not at war, and under the Constitution we still have a guaranty of free speech. I do not know how long it will last, because when I see this hysteria growing I wonder how long we will be permitted to speak our minds even upon the floor of the Senate and disagree with anything that anybody else says. Even if we say that we do not want to get into the war, we may be denounced as "fifth columnists" or as appeasers or isolationists.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President——

Mr. WHEELER. I will yield in a moment.

I called attention to the fact that the President of the United States, in his Chautauqua speech a few years ago, said, when he and others were being accused of being isolationists:

> We are not isolationists except insofar as we want to isolate this country against war.

But today, only 2 years later, if one wants to isolate this country against war and keep it out of war, he is immediately denounced by every British propagandist in the United States.

There are British propagandists in the United States; there are men in this country who want to see us get into this war, and there are men who are doing everything in their power to try to get us into the war. When I say that, I do not refer to anybody in the Government of the United States.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. LEE. Does the Senator feel that it is any more a violation of ethics for one on one side to abuse somebody who is preaching a doctrine which he thinks is sympathetic to Germany and to accuse him of being a "fifth columnist" than for one on the other side to accuse the other fellow, who states his opinion, of leading this country to war or being a warmonger or preaching a doctrine that will involve us in war, and accusing those who hold that opinion, because it disagrees with his, of spreading war hysteria?

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that I think both are bad.

Mr. LEE. In his first speech following the President's statement when the President told the people of this country that he thought there was a serious situation, did not Colonel Lindbergh then follow with a talk about war hysteria and warmongering?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think he accused the President of it, though, perhaps, he did.

Mr. LEE. But we are all able to put two and two together.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not read his speech, but if he did say that I would say that Colonel Lindbergh was wrong if he accused the President of the United States of warmongering. I have said, and I say it upon good authority and not second-hand information, that there are people in the United States of America today who would like to see our country get into the war tomorrow, and I say that those people are dangerous.

Mr. LEE. Will the Senator deny that there are people in this country also who are friendly to Germany and would like to see Germany overrun the world? Does the Senator deny that?

Mr. WHEELER. If there are in the Senator's acquaintance any such people he is a good deal more familiar with them than I am.

Mr. LEE. I do not understand why the Senator should make such a statement as that.

Mr. WHEELER. Then, let me say to the Senator, if there is anybody of that kind in the United States of America I have not met him.

Mr. LEE. We must not forget that all the countries which have fallen have been betrayed from within.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator, I went through the World War as United States district attorney and at that time everybody was seeing pro-Germans under every sagebush. With all the great German population in many of our States it is surprising how little subversive activity there was on the part of anybody excepting some half-crazy persons.

While there may be some such person, I cannot conceive of anybody in the United States wanting to see Mr. Hitler control the European Hemisphere, and particularly I cannot conceive of anybody in the United States wanting Hitler—no working man, no farmer——

Mr. LEE. What is the German-American Bund for?

Mr. WHEELER. Wait a minute. I cannot conceive of any American workingman or businessman or anybody else in the United States wanting to see Mr. Hitler come over and take over this Government, or set-up in this country the kind of government that he has over there. I cannot believe that there is any such person; and I should have to be shown specific, direct evidence, and evidence that would be beyond question of a doubt in my mind, before I would believe it of any American citizen.

Mr. LEE. Does not the Senator believe the German-American Bund would like to have that done?

Mr. WHEELER. I cannot believe it; no. I cannot believe it. Perhaps there are some such persons. I have heard about the German-American Bund. I do not happen to know anybody who belongs to the German-American Bund.

Mr. LEE. I do not, either.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think anybody in my State belongs to it.

Mr. LEE. There are many things which I believe but which I never saw and do not know. I never saw George Washington, but I think he was the first President of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. I am surprised that the Senator admits it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WHEELER. I do.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to ask the able Senator from Montana, in view of the line of argument which has been made, whether or not he agrees that it would make any difference to our future security whether Germany won the war or England won the war.

Mr. WHEELER. I think it would, quite frankly. I think it would make a difference to our security. I should much prefer, and think it would mean much more to our safety, if England won the war than if Germany won it.

Mr. LUCAS. In other words, then, the Senator admits in his last statement that the safety of America, from the standpoint of our future, is in a better position if England continues to exist as a country than if she is overrun by Hitler and the Nazi Government of Germany?

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that that is my judgment. I have not any facts upon which to base it. That is perhaps my prejudice because of the fact that every drop of blood in my veins is English, and my prejudices in the last war and in this war were and are in favor of Great Britain. I have not any facts upon which to base my judgment in that respect, but I believe that is true.

Mr. LUCAS. I want to say frankly to the Senator that I have no particular affection for England. I hold no brief for England in connection with this world situation, but I do have a selfish desire to see England win because of America. If England can be maintained as she is, in my humble opinion, and the British Empire kept more or less intact and the English Government continue to go along as she has been doing for the past 100 years, it strikes me that the people of America will be in a much better position from the standpoint of the perpetuity of a free and untrammelled government as we have understood it than if Mr. Hitler and his legions conquer that island.

Mr. WHEELER. There has never been any dispute upon that question between the Senator and myself.

Mr. LUCAS. Not at all; that is correct.

Mr. WHEELER. I believe that to be true, although, as I said, if somebody should ask me for some concrete fact I should have to give it as a conclusion on my part. I am anxious to see this country build up its defenses against any eventuality, and I thoroughly believe that if we build up our defenses in an orderly, sane, safe, businesslike way, Hitler will not attempt to come over here, but I am not going to be carried away with all this buncombe and propaganda to the effect that if Hitler wins over there he will come over to the United States and attack us tomorrow or the next day; and without knowing anything about it, I am not willing to believe that any of the South American countries are going to go over and become part and parcel of Mr. Hitler.

Mr. LUCAS. In reply to the Senator, let me say that I am not going to be carried away in these debates by hysteria. I hope I shall always keep my feet on the floor of the Senate while I am here.

Mr. WHEELER. I am for the Senator. If free and open conventions are held in his State, I am confident he will be here.

Mr. LUCAS. That is problematical, but, referring to the argument which the Senator made a moment ago in reading the article of William Allen White about the Versailles Treaty, no one can consistently say that the Versailles Treaty was not a hard-driven bargain against Germany.

There is not any doubt about that, and anyone who will read the treaty must admit it. I maintain, however, that the Senate of the United States cannot assess the blame of the past. It is our duty as legislators to look world problems squarely in the face and legislate here in order to do what we think is best for our own people at this particular time.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator; but I did not read this letter for that purpose. I read the letter because William Allen White said, at least in part, substantially what Mr. Lindbergh said. When Mr. Lindbergh said it, it was immediately claimed that he is a "fifth columnist." I say that any body who makes that statement is not a "fifth columnist" by any manner of means; and we should not start out by so designating every citizen of the United States who happens to disagree with our views. We should not start out by saying that such a man is a "fifth columnist" and denounce everybody who has the temerity to speak his mind, no matter how wrong he may be. We should not denounce him and say, "You are this," or "You are that." We have had too much of it, and those of us who went through the last war ought to try in every possible way to keep down this hysteria. I deplore organizations, columnists, and other individuals who are seeking to stir up hysteria for any purpose whatsoever.

Mr. LUCAS. I am very happy to know that the Senator from Montana is in accord with my views as to the safety of America in the future if England should be successful in the war, because on Sunday, when Colonel Lindbergh made his speech, and if the Senator will read it very carefully——

Mr. WHEELER. I have not read it.

Mr. LUCAS. He will find that Colonel Lindbergh said that it does not make any difference who wins the war over there, whether it is England or Germany; that we shall be able thereafter to have one strong government here in the Western Hemisphere and one strong government over in Europe, and between the two of us, with treaties, we shall be able to control the world and get along.

Mr. WHEELER. I certainly would not subscribe to that view.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not subscribe to that doctrine, and so stated in an address which I made over the radio, because there is only one reason why the Senate has sat here day after day and appropriated billions upon billions of dollars, both Democrats and Republicans alike, with unanimity of thought and action and purpose and it is not to stop England. It is not to stop Poland, or Czechoslovakia, or France, or any other country than Germany. There is just one reason when we get down to uttering cold, solid truths, and that is to keep the totalitarian germ of Nazi Germany from spreading to the shores of America. That is the only reason on which we can base the votes that we have cast here. That is the basic reason for the justification of spending billions upon billions of the taxpayers' money.

Otherwise, whom do we fear? We cannot say that we fear England. We have lived by the side of England for 100 years and more without any trouble. We do not fear Canada on the north. There is not a fortress there. There is not a gun along the line. We have no trouble with Mexico to the south. There are no fortresses there.

Mr. WHEELER. No, but wait a minute; wait a minute.

Mr. LUCAS. There is no Maginot line there.

Mr. WHEELER. If we listen to some people, they will tell us that we have to fear Mexico.

Mr. LUCAS. Well, all right; assuming that we do have to fear Mexico. Let me go back to my argument about England. We do not fear Mexico very much, but perhaps we may have to do so.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think we shall.

Mr. LUCAS. But so far as England is concerned certainly she is not the one because of whom we are appropriating these billions upon billions of the taxpayers' money for munitions and implements of war. There is only one reason why we are doing it, and that is because of Adolf Hitler and the Nazi Government. He may never attempt to come here. He may never attempt to invade us, and I hope he will not, but there is an honest fear that he will upon the part of a number of patriotic people, and if we read his book it will be found that he tells the world that his Storm Troopers will ultimately be here. The impossible in Europe has become the possible during the past few months. My activities in the United States Senate during the last few months have all been predicated upon keeping autocracy out of this country.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator did not do differently than I did.

Mr. LUCAS. No; that is true, and I congratulate the Senator on that, but I wanted to mention that point because he is defending the Colonel here today and that is perfectly all right. In my speech of yesterday I said that every individual has a right to say whatever he wants under our Bill of Rights.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me correct the Senator. I am not defending Colonel Lindbergh. I am saying that when we are not at war, when we are at peace, I want to see free speech in this country preserved. I think it is a very bad mistake for people to rise and say that Colonel Lindbergh is a "fifth columnist," or is pro-German, or is in the pay of the German Government, just as it is unfair to say, when a man rises and makes a pro-English speech, and takes the words out of some Englishman's mouth and uses them in his speech, that that man is in the pay of Great Britain.

Mr. LUCAS. What the Senator wants is what we should have, and what we will never get because free speech gives every individual the right to say just about what he wants to say, and certainly the United States Senate is the supreme forum for it all, as it should be. Unity of thought and unity of action and judgment and purpose is a most desirable objective in a great emergency like the one now confronting us, but it is difficult to obtain, because of the different views honestly entertained by Members of the United States Senate.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, we cannot get absolute unity of opinion in the United States, and we should not expect it, but as Members of the United States Senate, as men to whom a great many people look to because of our position, when we make statements indicating that this man is a "fifth columnist" and that man is a "fifth columnist," or that someone is in the pay of some other country, we are not only doing an injury to the country, but in my judgment we are injuring ourselves individually and collectively.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not disagree with the Senator from Montana in that statement.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I have listened several days to what has been said in the debate on the pending measure, but there are just two ideas I wish to hit, and to hit hard.

First, it has gone out over the country that the United States Senate is hysterical. The mere fact that several Members of the body blow off steam is no indication that the Senate is hysterical. There are 96 of us here, and I do not know of one whose mind is not clicking. But we are all human, and when someone sticks a pin into another he naturally resents it. But that is not serious.

I wish to say to the country, and to say emphatically, that the Senate of the United States is not hysterical, it is not losing its balance, it is not going to pieces, it is keeping its head, and it is thinking straight. No one need worry about the Senate muddling this country into war. There is no such thought on the part of any Senator.

One other thing, Mr. President. On the other side of the aisle there have come two suggestions in the last two or three days, one that business is not cooperating in this emergency. I wish to hit that, and to hit it hard. One suggestion came from the Senator from Oklahoma just a few days ago when he indicated that business was not cooperating.

Mr. WHEELER. I was about to close my remarks, and then the Senator can take all the time he desires.

Mr. WILEY. It will take me only a moment.

Mr. WHEELER. If it will take only a moment, very well; but I am practically through. If the Senator wishes to ask me a question, I will yield; but I did not want to yield for a speech, because I wish to conclude.

Mr. WILEY. I merely wanted to comment on the statement I have just made.

Mr. WHEELER. Very well.

Mr. WILEY. A statement was made that the businessmen in this country were not willing to cooperate. I wish to say that that is not correct. In other words, assume a businessman with an institution with a capital of $5,000,000, which is making money and is engaged in manufacturing. The Government comes to that man and wants him to take on a war contract which will mean an enlargement of the plant and an expansion perhaps entailing the expenditure of ten or fifteen million dollars. This businessman will not have such a large amount of money available, and, besides, it is necessary that he give consideration to his business. Business has gone ahead and has said, "If the Government will insure this ten or fifteen million dollars, which we have not got, we will be taken care of, so that if the emergency ceases tomorrow we can go ahead and carry on our business without having an indebtedness of ten or fifteen million dollars. Then we will go ahead."

I think in that respect there has been too much reference to failure to have unity in the country. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. WHEELER. I was about to say that when the Government takes a boy and puts him into the Army and sends him off it not only takes his capital but it takes everything he has, possibly including his life. I have not much sympathy with people who say, "You have to act so that we can make some more money," and then say, "Conscript the youth of the country and not only take their capital but perhaps take their arms, their legs, or their lives." Who is there that is going to make up that capital to those boys?

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I shall yield the floor, unless the Senator has a question to ask.

Mr. LEE. I should like to read a paragraph in answer to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me turn this colloquy over to the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma obtained the floor.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I have been waiting all day for the opportunity to make a brief statement, and I shall occupy the time of the Senate now to make it.

Yesterday the question of the relative value of the dollar of today and 20 years ago, or in 1920, was raised. I made the statement yesterday that the dollar at present has twice the buying power the dollar had in 1920. Today that statement is questioned. Reference has been made to the cost of a battleship in 1920 and the cost of a battleship today.

Mr. BONE. I suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that I am not questioning his statement; I am merely questioning the propriety and the wisdom of the United States paying three times as much for battleships with a dollar with twice the purchasing power. I am basing that conclusion on the assumption that the Senator's figures are correct. I am not prepared to challenge them, and I want him to understand that I do not.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Since my statement has been inferentially challenged, at least, I desire to make the record a little more complete. I make the flat statement now that the American dollar today buys approximately twice as much as the American dollar bought in 1920.

On June 20, 1920, cotton was selling for 42.46 cents a pound. Today cotton is selling for 9.39 cents a pound. In other words, cotton was more than four times as valuable twenty years ago, in terms of money, as it is today. That means, in relation to cotton, the dollar today has four times the purchasing power it had 20 years ago.

On June 20, 1920, corn was selling for $1.90 a bushel. Yesterday corn sold for 59¾ cents a bushel. So again, as measured in corn, the dollar is worth more than three times what it was worth in 1920.

On June 20, 1920, wheat was selling for $3.07 cash in Chicago, and $2.91 cash in Kansas City. Yesterday wheat was selling for 74⅞ cents a bushel on the Ghicago Board of Trade. So, as measured in terms of wheat, the dollar today buys more than twice as much of farm products as it did 20 years ago, in 1920.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator be generous and yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BONE. Again I wish to repeat that I am not challenging the accuracy of the Senator's conclusion. I want him to understand that.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes, Mr. President, but the illustration given a little while ago could be construed as rather ridiculing the statement I made yesterday, when I stated that the dollar was worth twice as much today in terms of property as it was worth 20 years ago.

Mr. BONE. I cannot understand how the Senator from Oklahoma can draw that conclusion. What I am objecting to is what we are paying for battleships today. I am not objecting to the Senator's thesis.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I wish to complete the record. In 1920 the Republican platform was adopted in Chicago. I was not present, but I have a copy of that document in my hand, and I desire to read from such Republican platform to sustain the position I am now taking. I read the plank under the title "The high cost of living." The Republicans in 1920 condemned the Democratic Party as being responsible for the high cost of living. Is there anyone now condemning anyone else for the high cost of living? Is there any political party now demanding that the high cost of living be reduced? This is what the Republicans declared in 1920:

> The prime cause of the "high cost of living" has been first and foremost a 50-percent depreciation in the purchasing power of the dollar, due to a gross expansion of our currency and credit.

That meant that the dollar in 1920 had only 50 percent of the purchasing power this particular party thought it should have. It meant that the dollar was worth 50 cents, in the opinion of the Republican Party in Chicago in 1920. The statement I made yesterday was that the dollar was worth some 65 cents in 1920 in terms of commodities and property.

I did not rise to dwell on this question further than to reassert my position, which cannot be assailed.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BONE. My point in rising in the first place was to ask the Senator fairly about the price level of those materials which went into the construction of war munitions in the year 1920. I had in mind iron and steel and textiles, but primarily iron and steel, which go into the construction of battleships, together with electrical equipment. The Senator has misconstrued my attitude entirely. I desire to know if he can advise us whether or not iron and steel and other materials which went into the construction of warships in 1920 had the same relative prices other commodities he has described had, because then we would have some index figure so that we could determine whether or not we were being fairly treated now. I merely took the declaration of the Senator from Oklahoma, which was referred to by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] that the dollar today would buy twice as much as would have been the case 20 years ago.

If it will buy twice as much, the next question is, will it buy twice as much of such fundamental commodities as iron and steel, and if it will, I submit to my brethren of the Senate that this Government is then paying three times as much for a battleship now as it cost to build a battleship in 1920. If there is anything unfair in this comparison, someone should rise and rebuke me. This statement ought not to stand unchallenged in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am assuming that the Senator from Oklahoma knows what he is talking about. I have always listened to him with interest, and he knows what he is talking about. When he referred to commodity prices, he referred to 784 commodities, and I want to ask him if they included iron and steel, which go into battleships.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. They did.

Mr. BONE. That being the case, the Members of the Senate—unless someone challenges the Senator from Oklahoma and proves that he is wrong—have the job of discovering why we are paying three times as much as we did in this era of high prices, which were denounced by Republicans.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I am not prepared to go into the cost of battleships and the things which go to make up a battleship. I will have to leave that to someone else to discuss.

I rose to refer to a meeting of some 100 citizens from some 9 States in the Central West, held in Kansas City about 10 days ago. These citizens were high-ranking officials of the several chambers of commerce of cities of the States of Missouri, Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, Arkansas, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Oklahoma. These 100 citizens assembled in Kansas City and held what the newspapers termed a "revolt congress." After much discussion, so I am advised, in this "revolt congress" held in Kansas City, the question arose as to whether or not the States mentioned were securing their fair share of the "pork" or "bacon" that is to be the result of this expansion program. It seemed to be the impression among these citizens from these 9 States that the States were not sharing in the factories, in the munitions plants, in the arsenals, in the airports, and the other component parts of a military program. So the question finally arose as to what could be done about it. Two suggestions were made. One was that they should send a committee of 100 of their citizens to Washington and advise the administration that this great section of the United States is being seriously neglected. But that was not considered to be feasible. They said that was merely a sort of usual, standard resolution of a chamber of commerce. So the motion was made that they hold a second "revolt congress" in Kansas City on August 30 of this year. That motion prevailed. So a second "revolt congress," consisting of the Representatives of the 9 States mentioned, is now called to be held in Kansas City on the 30th day of August.

The second motion made was that the Senators and the Representatives from these nine States be commanded to attend that "congress" in Kansas City—not to be invited, but to be commanded to attend the congress. And if any Representative or Senator running for reelection, or nominated in the first instance, refuses to agree to attend, then his opponent shall be invited to attend.

Mr. President, the clear inference is that the Representatives and Senators must either get "bacon" for their constituents or get out, because the newspaper reports are very clear that if the Representatives and Senators do not proceed forthwith to get airports, airfields, arsenals, and manufacturing establishments, immediately, they are going to be defeated in November, and their opponents will be elected to take their places.

I desire to call attention now to the headlines appearing above this news story. This conference, held a few days ago, elected as its president a gentleman by the name of Mr. Richard W. Robbins, and they chose to call their conference the Midwest Defense Conference, with headquarters at Hotel Muehlebach, in Kansas City, Mo.

The headlines appearing in the Kansas City Times of Saturday, July 27, 1940, are as follows:

A Midwest call.
Congressmen from 9 States summoned to Kansas City August 30.
For a share in defense.
"Revolt Congress" is planned by chambers of commerce in area.
Protest is against program "robbing us of manpower and industry."
Pressure to bring men.

I read now the first paragraph from this very lengthy news article.

A militant conference of middle western business leaders yesterday called a "revolt congress" for August 30 in Kansas City to which will be summoned congressional representatives in a 9-State area to meet the emergency arising from the present trend of the national-defense program.

The unprecedented move was agreed upon at the Midwest Chambers of Commerce conference as necessary to halt the continued industrial development of established manufacturing centers at the expense of the Middle West. Every Senator and Representative in Congress from every State in the area will be called to the 1-day conference to be told—to be told that the Middle West is in "revolt" against a program that "is robbing us of our manpower, our industry, and our resources."

Farther down in this news story, when the question was up for consideration as to whether or not they would come to Washington or whether they would have Washington come to them, this statement appears:

Sending a delegation to Washington is a routine chamber formula.

Mr. President, I do not care to read further from the news article because it is not necessary. I do desire at this point to ask permission to incorporate in the RECORD as a part of my remarks my letter to the chairman of this conference in answer to his invitation to attend the conference. Suffice it to say that I respectfully declined to attend the conference.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 2, 1940.

Mr. RICHARD W. ROBBINS,
Chairman, Midwest Defense Conference,
Hotel Muehlebach, Kansas City, Mo.

MY DEAR MR. ROBBINS: I acknowledge receipt of your favor of July 30, containing news items from the Kansas City papers. I have read the stories with interest, and note that a "revolt congress" has been called to meet in Kansas City on August 30, and that such congress demands the presence of the Senators and Representatives from the States of Missouri, Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, Arkansas, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Oklahoma. Also, I note that the political opponents of the Congressmen and Senators are likewise commanded to attend.

From the press reports I note the charge that the States mentioned have "poor representation" in the Congress, and also the veiled threat that the Congressmen and Senators must either "get bacon or get out." If the local press reported the proceedings correctly then it is clear that a revolution is under way, and that the war will break out very shortly. Whether or not the press reported correctly the temper and proceedings of the conference, the demands of the delegates attending must be considered.

This reply is my own, and I do not presume to speak for any Member of the Congress save myself.

I happen to know the Senators and most of the Representatives from the States mentioned, and am certain that no group of States has more able and energetic Representatives in the Congress than those representing the complaining States. My statement is intended to cover Senators and Representatives of both political parties, without differentiation.

Under the Constitution the Congress makes policies and appropriates funds to carry such policies into effect; thereafter, the executive branch is authorized to administer and execute the laws, and to use the funds appropriated to carry out the policies of the Congress.

In the prosecution of the national-defense program the Congress has not acted in any partisan sense and the program is being supported by members of all parties, and it is certain that to date the program has not, in any sense, been considered either as a "pork barrel" proposition or as a "log rolling" contest.

The news stories sent me indicate very clearly that your conference demanded that the vast areas of level ground in that State (Kansas) be used for air training and underground-munitions storehouses; that one of the three N. Y. A. aviation training schools be located in Kansas; that the Chillicothe gunstock and iron-casting plants be reopened; that the Springfield, Mo., machine shops be converted into the production of light tanks and gun carriages; that the Frisco Railroad shop located at Springfield and the large supply of skilled labor be utilized in the war-expansion program; that the Midwest should get a break, and should the Congressman and Senators fail to secure air bases, arsenals, powder plants, manufacturing plants. and other military institutions for their districts and States, then the penalty will be certain defeat in November.

Risking the charge of "passing the buck," let me outline the plan relative to national defense under which we operate here in Washington.

The United States maintains two great military institutions—one located at Annapolis for the training of Navy officers, and the other located at West Point for the training of Army officers. In the conduct of these schools the brightest boys of the country are selected for intensive training. After 4 years these youngsters are graduated and sent out for active service. The more capable and energetic of these graduates are promoted and from time to time are given special courses of instruction. We have the several special post-graduate schools such as the School of Fire located at Fort Sill, the Cavalry School located at Fort Riley, and the special school for officers located at Fort Leavenworth, and other schools for special training are located at other points in the United States.

After these promising officers have gone through the several post-graduate schools there is still another school available to those who demonstrate special fitness for the military service. This school is located here in Washington and is known as the Army War College.

When our Army and Navy officers have been thus trained scientifically and practically in the field and on the ocean, they are presumed to be experts in the affairs of the Army and Navy. However, many of our most efficient officers and experts have secured their preliminary training at schools other than those mentioned, but all have had the advantages of our special schools and the experience acquired in either actual war or long service in their respective branches of the Service. It is upon this group of specially trained men that we rely for the plans and advice in the development and management of our military and naval establishments.

So far as I know the members of the Senate and House have not lobbied with the general staff of the War Department or the high ranking officials of the Navy Department, in trying to secure the location and establishment of depots, air bases, forts, and military manufacturing institutions within their districts and States. Without exception, however, the Members of the House and Senate have placed before the respective departments all information available relative to the advantages of the several districts and States for military activities. Also, the Members of Congress have arranged conferences to the end that all citizens and committees desiring to confer with the respective heads of the Government have had such opportunities made available to them.

I am sure that I voice the opinion entertained generally that our military establishments should be so expanded and developed as to afford the maximum of protection for our people, our property, and our Government. If those in responsible positions are not locating our military institutions at the proper points, then our country will surely suffer, because these men are not politicians, in fact, very few of them even vote, and their whole duty and responsibility is to see to it that our military establishments are developed, maintained, and managed in the best possible manner.

You will note that the present expansion program provides for the location of our military defense works along the borders of the United States. As a matter of necessity, the naval bases and yards must be located on our coast lines, and as a matter of protection the airplane bases must be located within reasonable distances of the coast and boundary lines of our country.

It occurs to me that the location of our military factories for the production of military supplies should be located away from the coast and boundary lines, which would mean in the interior of the country. However, you must know that the Government owns no airplane factories and, aside from our arsenals located at Boston and Springfield, Mass., and at Schenectady and Troy, N. Y., and the military plant located at Rock Island, Ill., practically all other military manufacturing institutions are privately owned and operated; hence the Government cannot be criticized because of the fact our airplane factories are, as a rule, located along the Pacific coast in the West and on or near the Atlantic coast in the East. I am advised that some of these great airplane-manufacturing concerns, realizing the mistake they made in the beginning, are establishing plants and branch factories in the interior so as to be more immune from enemy attack than they are at present.

If we should be attacked from abroad, the enemy would have to enter the United States either from the Pacific or the Atlantic coasts or from Canada on the north or Mexico on the south; hence, there seems to exist the best of reasons for establishing our major air bases not on but near the coast and boundary lines of our Nation.

During the latter part of 1939 I made a 22,000-mile trip, inspecting our Military Establishments, and after this study I came to the conclusion that it was entirely proper for the several air bases to be located near the coast and boundary lines, but that the manufacturing plants should be located away from the coast and boundary lines. However, inasmuch as we are not establishing manufacturing plants, there is little, if anything, we can do regarding the location of the major portion of our military manufacturing institutions.

Before closing let me remind you that the President has requested the services of a number of the outstanding industrialists and technical experts to advise and assist in carrying out our defense program, and these gentlemen have quit their private activities and are devoting their entire time, without remuneration, to the interests of their Government and country.

I am taking the liberty of calling the attention of our high-ranking officials here in Washington to the action taken by the Kansas City conference. It may be that the conference already held and the second conference coming on August 30 may have the effect of calling the attention of the Government to the advisability of the location and establishment of new military manufacturing institutions away from the coast and boundary lines, which would mean back in the interior. If this policy is deemed advisable and should be adopted, then the States located in the interior would automatically receive consideration for the location of such establishments.

This communication is not a criticism of the citizens who called and held the recent Kansas City conference, but rather an explanation of how things military are done here in Washington.

Inasmuch as I was elected by the citizens of Oklahoma to serve them in the Congress, and inasmuch as the Congress is now in session, I regret that I shall not be able to attend the second Kansas City meeting. However, should the meeting be held, and should it take any action by resolutions, or otherwise, I shall be glad to give due consideration to the wishes of the conference.

Respectfully submitted.

ELMER THOMAS,
United States Senator, Oklahoma.

Mr. BARKLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I was about to attempt to have an agreement reached to limit debate on the measure under consideration, but I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the matter that I shall now refer to may appear immediately following my previous remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HOLT. I should like to know what the request is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLT. I object temporarily until I know what the request is.

Mr. MINTON. I am going to put in the RECORD excerpts from newspapers in West Virginia in support of statements I made here in reference to the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLT. Under the circumstances, Mr. President, as it can be seen that I will have no chance to reply today, I shall object. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that if he waits until tomorrow, when I can reply on the floor of the Senate, I have no objection to the Senator putting the matter to which he refers in the RECORD, but I do object now, near the end of today's session, to putting it in the RECORD, when I have no chance to reply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. MINTON. I will read it then.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to make a request for an agreement to limit debate.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I wish to get this matter in the RECORD today. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will yield to me.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no objection to yielding to the Senator. I simply want to try to get an agreement to limit debate on the measure under consideration.

Mr. MINTON. I shall take only a minute.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. I have made certain statements with reference to the Senator from West Virginia today which he said were not true. The basis of my statements was the records of the Congress of the United States, page 552 of the Senate committee hearings, 1938, on the nomination of F. Roy Yoke to be collector of internal revenue for the district of West Virginia, and the speech of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 11, 1938, at page 322 and following.

I hold in my hand a photostatic copy of the Clarksburg Exponent, published in Clarksburg, W. Va., of date Thursday, April 12, 1917. I read from the first page of this newspaper as follows:

HOLT, OF WESTON, SPURNS UNITED STATES FLAG AS SOCIALISTS CHEER HIM

ST. LOUIS, April 11.—In a dramatic appeal to the gathering not to assist the United States in the war with Germany, Dr. M. S. Holt, of Weston, W. Va., today addressed the meeting of Socialists in convention at the Planters Hotel and was loudly cheered when he stated that he would not let his boy fight for the Stars and Stripes.

"I sent my boy to South America so that he would not have to go to war," declared Holt. His declaration brought the audience to its feet and he was given round after round of applause.

The same Clarksburg Exponent, on April 18, 1917, contained an editorial in which it quoted a letter from Dr. M. S. Holt, which was published in the Clarksburg Telegram.

This is Dr. Holt's letter:

My son in the last week left America at his own volition and by desire of his mother. Why? He left to go to a country where they had peace. My son went to South America, started within the last week. He may go to Brazil, but I want him to go to a country that is at peace. I did not raise my boy for cannon fodder. Millions of mothers over this country today are looking forward to see what is going to be the result of this convention. I left my wife with tearful eyes on account of her sons, one approaching the age and the other at the age when he could be conscripted. He is in technical school, studying to be a chemical engineer. Now, gentlemen, Prussianism drove the best men out of Prussia, and drove them to America. Are we going to adopt Prussianism here, and drive our best men to some other country? That is the question.

It is on the basis of publications of that kind that I made my statement.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HOLT. Of course, those present can tell what is wrong with the Senator from Indiana. The people of Indiana should know what is wrong with him.

Mr. MINTON. The people of West Virginia found out what was wrong with the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I will not yield to the Senator from Indiana for any purpose.

Mr. MINTON. The people of West Virginia answered that question for him.

Mr. HOLT. That is true. They did; but I did not have to buy my seat in the United States Senate, as the Senator from Indiana hopes to buy his seat from the State of Indiana this year.

The whole truth of the matter is——

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask to be protected.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have the floor.

Mr. HOLT. I feel that I should have a right to reply.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have yielded to the Senator.

Mr. HOLT. I thank the Senator from Kentucky.

The Senator from Indiana is not in shape to be on the floor.

Mr. MINTON. What does the Senator mean by that statement?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator wishes to reply to the article read by the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. MINTON. I want the Senator from West Virginia to say what he means by his last statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think remarks such as the Senator from West Virginia has made are proper.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I wish to speak in my own time tomorrow.

Mr. MINTON. I should like to have the Senator from West Virginia say what he means by saying that I am not in shape to be on the floor.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to allow me to make a statement?

Mr. MINTON. I want him to make it.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask to be protected.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have already yielded to the Senator.

Mr. HOLT. I realize that; but I think the Chair should force the Senator from Indiana to be a gentleman.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLT. I wish to make a statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish the Senator would curb his tongue a little, if I am to continue to yield to him. I know the propensity of all of us at times to make remarks which are not exactly proper, but I hope the Senator from West Virginia will observe the proprieties. I will say the same thing to my friend from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. I shall endeavor to do so.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. Both Senators must do so if I am further to yield.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I wish to speak in my own time tomorrow, to prove that the statement and the article were denied by my father and proved to be untrue; but, of course, like lice, they continue to be carried by rats.

That is all I care to say at this time.

Mr. MINTON. That statement is typical of the foulmouthed Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I decline further to yield.

I rose to undertake to secure unanimous consent for a limitation of debate during the further consideration of the joint resolution. We have had 2 days of debate, presumably on the pending measure; but, as a matter of fact, most of it has gone far afield. It has been interesting and instructive. I am not criticizing any Senator or objecting to it, but it seems to me that the time has now arrived when we ought to confine our discussion to the pending measure. Another bill is expected to come up Thursday, upon which much of the debate which has been carried on in connection with the pending measure would be more appropriate than it has been in connection with the measure under consideration.

Obviously, we cannot conclude consideration of the joint resolution today. I am hoping that we can do so tomorrow. To that end, I ask unanimous consent that during the further consideration of the joint resolution no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes on the joint resolution or any amendment thereto, which means that any Senator may speak for 40 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Do I correctly understand that the Members of this body are limited to 20 minutes on the joint resolution itself?

Mr. BARKLEY. Twenty minutes on the joint resolution and 20 minutes on any amendment.

Mr. REYNOLDS. On each and every amendment which is offered?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I should like to ask what matter is to be taken up now.

Mr. AUSTIN. The amendment which I offered to the committee amendment, beginning on page 2, line 18.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair state the parliamentary situation. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] to the committee amendment, on page 2, line 18.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has accepted the amendment to the amendment, may we not dispose of it now?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator's amendment provides that a member of any reserve component of the land or naval forces who is in active duty shall be permitted to file a certificate, and so forth. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that the words "or who may be assigned to active duty" be added, so that those who may be assigned to active duty from day to day may be protected, as are the Reserves on active duty.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I have no objection to that modification, if I correctly understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator please state the place where he proposes to modify the amendment?

Mr. WALSH. In line 3 of the Senator's amendment, after the word "duty", there should be inserted the words "or who may be assigned to active duty." The Senator's amendment takes care of only those who are now on active duty. My suggestion would take care of those who may be assigned to active duty, and who may do everything which is required in order to file the certificate mentioned.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let me observe that I understand the joint resolution to be drafted in such a way that those words are not necessary, because the language of the joint resolution on page 1, line 9, is "with or without their consent." However, I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion. It is a mere redundancy, but I think it may reassure the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. It is suggested to me by the naval authorities.

Mr. AUSTIN. I talked to the young gentleman representing the Naval Reserve about it, and pointed out the language in the original text of the joint resolution. However, I am perfectly willing to accept the modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator modify his amendment as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. AUSTIN. I so modify the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, is not the language usually "called to active service"?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; in this case they are ordered.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator used the word "assigned."

Mr. AUSTIN. I know nothing about that particular word, except that the Reserve officers may be assigned. They are not necessarily ordered. They are assigned, with or without their consent.

Mr. CONNALLY. Well, they are in the Reserve, and they are called to active duty.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; the language of the joint resolution on page 1 is "order":

The President * * * is hereby authorized to order * * * with or without their consent.

However, I will not quibble about the language of the amendment or the substance of it. I am willing to take it as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the modified amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the committee amendment is agreed to.

The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which I previously sent to the desk, and ask that it be stated. I do not ask for action on it tonight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, after line 17, it is proposed to add a new subsection, to read:

(f) Any person now subject to the provisions of section 1 may resign his status within 20 days after the approval of this act.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: Is the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut the pending amendment, or is it merely submitted to lie on the table? If it is lying on the table, I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the pending amendment.

STATEMENT BY AMBASSADOR CUDAHY AS TO BEHAVIOR OF GERMAN SOLDIERS IN BELGIUM

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have just read in the afternoon Washington Daily News the most amazing statement that I have seen in any newspaper in the United States since the war began. I sincerely hope I shall not be called "pro-Nazi" or "fifth columnist" by reason of calling this amazing statement to the attention of the members of this body. I was really appalled by it.

I desire to read the statement. Perhaps our representative to Belgium should be investigated. It says:

NAZI TROOPS BEHAVING BETTER THAN AMERICANS

LONDON, August 6.—United States Ambassador to Belgium John Cudahy today paid tribute to behavior of the German army of occupation in Belgium, after prefacing his remarks by saying: "You may think I'm pro-German."

"The German troops are behaving better than American soldiers," he said.

Then the article continues about his interest in feeding the starving people in that country.

I say that I was amazed at this statement, because I have read so many articles about the Germans bayoneting and murdering little children and all that sort of stuff that we heard during the last war, prior to our entrance into it, that I wanted to bring this article to the attention of this body and ask that it be published in the Appendix of the RECORD. I do not understand what the Ambassador means when he says "The German troops are behaving better than American soldiers."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, to what American soldiers does Mr. Cudahy refer?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I have no idea. I do not understand.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are no American soldiers in Belgium.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly not.

Mr. BARKLEY. Where are the American soldiers who are not behaving as well as the Germans?

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is what I cannot understand. I say there are no soldiers on the face of the earth who are as well behaved as American soldiers. I wonder what is the matter with the article. I am sure there is nothing the matter with the Ambassador. He is a gentleman of very high intelligence. It must be a typographical error.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the Senator feel that before the article is printed and given congressional circulation he ought to ascertain what American soldiers are referred to?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I think possibly there ought to be a congressional investigation, Mr. President. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not suggest that.

Mr. REYNOLDS. And in view of the Senator's suggestion that there should be a congressional investigation, I am going to withhold the article for the present.

Mr. BARKLEY. I made no such suggestion, unless the Senator interprets my suggestion that he make an investigation as the suggestion of a congressional investigation.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I shall withhold the article.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the Chair). If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

That concludes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, August 7, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, AUGUST 6, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., pastor of Gunton Temple Memorial Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

All-wise and ever-blessed God, by whose life we live and by whose spirit we have understanding, may the blessings of Divine wisdom and strength be richly bestowed upon all who share in the responsibilities of government. How futile all our thinking and how vain all our efforts unless we have that wisdom and strength which cometh from above.

We pray that the spirit of the Great Master of men, His holiness of life and His heroism of faith may become regnant in our minds and hearts. May we give ourselves in complete surrender to His spirit, desiring what Thou willest and willing to do what Thou dost command.

Grant that, as a nation whose God is the Lord, we may not be afraid of that which is high, believing that no aspirations and hopes implanted in the human soul are too high or too holy to be fulfilled by Thy wisdom and power. May we then earnestly covet and courageously seek the true, the beautiful, and the good for ourselves and all men everywhere.

In the name of the Christ, our Saviour, we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 1114. An act to extend the jurisdiction of the United States District Court, Territory of Hawaii, over the Midway Islands, Wake Island, Johnston Island, Sand Island, Kingman Reef, Kure Island, Baker Island, Howland Island, Jarvis Island, Canton Island, Enderbury Island, and for other purposes.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, this is Private Calendar day. I understand that those who handle the calendar are not ready. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the business on the Private Calendar be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a radio address I delivered last night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein two editorials from the Grand Rapids Herald.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I received unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a speech by Daniel Webster. I have received a communication from the Public Printer in which he says it will take approximately three pages. I therefore ask unanimous consent to place those remarks in the RECORD despite the fact they exceed the limitation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered by Commissioner John C. Page of the Bureau of Reclamation before the Seventieth Annual Convention of the American Society of Civil Engineers, at Denver on July 24.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a discussion of the Monroe Doctrine by William R. Castle. This article will take approximately three and three-fourths pages, which is in excess of the limitation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a copy of the Washington Post of this morning. I see there a quotation of a reference by Attorney General Jackson to the "fifth column" as groups of disloyal citizens, disloyal workmen who are prepared to sabotage industrial plants. I am also interested in his further remarks before the State officials to the effect that the law should be enforced. I am again going to ask Mr. Jackson why he does not conform to his own oath of office and prosecute Harry Bridges for perjury, because he has in his possession four documents by Mr. Bridges giving different dates, which are perjurious on their face. If Mr. Jackson can advise the whole country—and I believe he is sound in his advice—to enforce the law, why does he not do it himself? I was gratified to see this Bureau transferred to him from Secretary Perkins, who had really abused her office by not enforcing the law, so I am asking Mr. Jackson why he does not enforce the law.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. EDELSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered by Hon. Nicholas Atlas, assistant district attorney of New York County, on June 28, 1940, over station WHOM.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address by President Woodrow Wilson delivered on April 2, 1917.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein three short resolutions of the Department of Alabama of the American Legion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter I received from a Townsend organization.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, every day there comes to my desk the United States Treasury statement, and when I see the Treasury statement of August 1, which is just 30 days after the beginning of a new fiscal year, I notice it reveals the fact that you have gone into the red over one-half a billion dollars—$502,347,308.39 in 30 days. That is terrible, you are becoming worse off every minute. You evidently do not realize what you are doing or else you do not care, which?

Now, what is the situation for the coming year of 1941? Do you men know that we have appropriated or authorized about $20,000,000,000 at this session, which began January 1? That is horrible to conceive. Dreadful to anticipate. It will mean a financial wreck to our Nation.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield for a question.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will not the gentleman tell the House whether or not he voted for the bills appropriating the money that he is now complaining about.

Mr. RICH. I did not approve very many bills except national defense.

Mr. COCHRAN. That is the big item.

Mr. RICH. I do not yield any further, Mr. Speaker. My record of voting will exonerate me from waste and extravagance. I am for national defense, and that is not the waste I refer to. I am for stopping this squandering, New Deal waste and extravagance in Government which is just what all the New Deal Members of Congress have been doing. They have been squandering the funds of the taxpayers, and they ought to be ashamed of themselves. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] rises every day and reads the Treasury statement. He complains about the amount of money that is being spent and about the deficit, but still, on roll calls, he votes for the billions of dollars carried in the appropriation bills that cause the deficit. It looks to me as though the gentleman should be consistent.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. When I have finished my statement.

Mr. RICH. That is not so.

Mr. COCHRAN. As I said, it looks to me as though the gentleman should be consistent.

Mr. RICH. And the record shows it is not so.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman should either stop voting for the appropriations or stop complaining. [Laughter and applause.]

WIRE TAPPING AND "FIFTH COLUMN" ACTIVITIES

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I am puzzled these days and greatly puzzled. I do not know whether the world is turning upside down or whether black is becoming white. Democrats are turning Republicans, Republicans are turning Democrat, and I am wondering. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the condition we are in is rather peculiar because the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], who was responsible for doing away with wire tapping some 20 years ago, now has a bill before us for wire tapping and the dean of the House, Mr. SABATH, who has always opposed the Dies committee, now has introduced a bill that is more drastic on the curbing of "fifth column" activities than even the Dies committee would propose, and so I am wondering what is happening. [Laughter and applause.]

COL. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, according to newspaper reports, someone yesterday referred to Col. Charles A. Lindbergh as chief of the "fifth column" in the United States. Such hysteria is contemptible. Regardless of whether or not we agree with Colonel Lindbergh's policies on foreign affairs or on domestic problems, any fair-minded person will admit that he is a sincere and patriotic American citizen. When we reach a point where we can refer to a man who disagrees with us as a "fifth columnist" and let that sort of accusation go unchallenged, affairs are in a rather serious condition.

If I understand it correctly, the phrase "fifth column" originated in Spain and had particular reference to people who were disloyal or not in sympathy with the existing Government in that country, and the designation is attributed to General Franco.

In the United States, following the exposé of disloyal and communistic forces within our own Government, the words "fifth columnists" became popular as designating people who were opposed to our form of government.

A reference to Colonel Lindbergh in this character is ridiculous and ought to have the scorn and disapproval of everyone who believes in fair play. Disagree with a man if you will, but grant him the right to have his views without attempting to ruin his character, just as you have a right to your views and to protection against dastardly attacks upon your motives and your good name.

I repeat that Col. Charles A. Lindbergh is an outstanding American citizen and during the past years has rendered a real contribution to our American life and ways of living.

I have taken this occasion to comment on what took place yesterday, because Colonel Lindbergh was born in Minnesota and the people of that State are proud of him. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago there appeared an editorial in the Wyoming Tribune entitled "The Third Term" as something that is not done in America, and it contains a statement by the Right Reverend Hugh L. McMenamin, rector of the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception of Denver, which is the finest statement on the subject I have yet seen. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include that statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Did I understand the gentleman to say that is in reference to a third term?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. The distinguished gentleman who recently drafted the Republican Party and became its candidate for President, Mr. Wendell Willkie, announced yesterday that he would not ask for a third term, so the gentleman may feel relieved on that proposition.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am very glad to be assured by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

EXPENDITURE OF PUBLIC MONEYS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] says that we are inconsistent because we voted for some of these bills and then complain about the way the money is spent.

Mr. COCHRAN. Oh, no; that is not what I said.

Mr. HOFFMAN. When the President comes here and says they are going to bomb Omaha in 10 or 15 minutes, and then asks for money to prevent it, if we voted against the bill we would be accused of being unpatriotic. Why should we be criticized if we vote money for national defense and relief and then, when it is used to buy a third term, we kick about it? What is there inconsistent about that? Why doesn't the administration use the money for the purpose for which it is appropriated?

Mr. COCHRAN. It will be so used.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, no; the administration is already laying plans to purchase a third term to establish a dictatorship. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

WENDELL L. WILLKIE'S "CANDY STICK" GOVERNMENT

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday a certain former utility magnate, Mr. Wendell Willkie, who, as I said, recently drafted the Republican Party and became its candidate for the Presidency, made a statement in Iowa about what he called "candy stick" government. He said that this same kind of "candy stick" government had wrecked France.

The intimation was that the people who benefit from this administration have been given "sticks of candy." I wonder if he took the time or the trouble to tell the people of Iowa that the Power Trust he formerly represented, if he does not represent it now, was robbing the people of Iowa of $14,000,000 a year in overcharges for electric lights and power. I wonder if he told them who got that stick of candy.

I wonder if he took the time to tell them that a few years ago the stock of the Commonwealth and Southern, of which he was the president, was $30 a share, but after being sufficiently watered and expanded with inflated valuations, after all of the waste and extravagance, it is now down to $1.25 a share. I wonder if he told them who got that stick of candy.

I want Mr. Willkie to discuss that super-candy-stick government, the utilities fascisti, with which he has been so long identified, and whose influence brought about his nomination at Philadelphia. I want him to discuss that stick of candy which this supergovernment wrings from the helpless consumers of electric energy throughout the country, amounting to approximately $1,000,000,000 a year, and for which they get nothing in return.

That is the kind of "candy stick" that is wrecking this country from within. It would take about twice the wheat crop of the whole United States to pay these overcharges for electricity this year—this superstick of candy these power interests are enjoying at the expense of the unprotected consumers of electric lights and power.

The State of Iowa makes only about 10,000,000 bushels of wheat a year, which at the present price would bring about $7,000,000. Yet the people of that State are overcharged twice that amount, or $14,000,000 a year for their electricity.

I wish Mr. Willkie would tell the people of Iowa what gets that stick of candy. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, since the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has discussed the power question in his minute, I ask him to take another minute and explain the facts with reference to the testimony of Robert E. Healy, former chief counsel of the Federal Trade Commission, and now a New Deal member of the Securities and Exchange Commission, who testified during the Senate stock-market investigation hearings that the American utility investors were robbed of more than a billion dollars under the Cities Service Co. manipulations of Henry L. Doherty. The same Henry L. Doherty whom your New Deal "fuehrer" selected to have charge of his birthday-ball fund collecting rackets. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. KNUTSON. To propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Has the chief meter reader of the Democratic Party asked permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. I say, has the chief meter reader of the Democratic Party asked permission to revise and extend his remarks?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has been here too long not to understand that that is not a parliamentary inquiry. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, no, Mr. Speaker; the gentleman will never understand the power question. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

WIRE TAPPING

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up the resolution, House Resolution 537.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 537

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of House Joint Resolution 571, a joint resolution to authorize the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice to conduct investigations in the interests of national defense, and for that purpose to permit wire tapping in certain cases. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendment thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], to be in turn yielded by him as he sees fit. I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, my beloved Republican colleague from Illinois [Mr. MASON], who addressed the House a few minutes ago, says he cannot understand the changing conditions; and conditions are changing. Well, I agree with him. The gentleman stated that some Democrats are changing to be Republicans and some Republicans are changing to be Democrats.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. MASON. In all seriousness, I want to say that I am puzzled, because the gentleman from Illinois did vote against the continuation of the Dies committee, which had for its purpose the very same thing, that is, the curbing of un-American activities, which your bill now has. I am wondering.

Mr. SABATH. I will explain that thoroughly. In my colleague, who is a member of the Dies committee, I have the utmost confidence and always did, notwithstanding he is a Member coming from the other side. [Laughter.] He is honorable; he is honest; he is fair.

Mr. MASON. Then your opposition was not to the committee or the purposes for which the committee was formed?

Mr. SABATH. No, no.

Mr. MASON. But just to the chairman of the committee and his personal actions?

Mr. SABATH. That is right.

The gentleman is right in the last part of his statement where he says that many Republicans are changing and joining the Democratic ranks and will in the real interest of the country vote the Democratic ticket; but in classifying the few former Democrats who have advertised that they are going to oppose President Roosevelt's reelection and have joined the Republican Party he is not accurate, because those gentlemen, so-called former Democrats to whom he has alluded, like Al Smith, Jim Reed, Louie Douglas, John W. Hanes, John Rascob, and others, are all "ex's" and nearly all of them were openly or secretly opposed to President Roosevelt in 1932 and 1936 and have been antagonistic to his policies and to the New Deal generally and continuously. Most of these gentlemen who came into great wealth, many times by the efforts of others, have no interest in progressive legislation in the interest of the masses. This is well known to the American people who recognize the great and helpful strides that have been made by President Roosevelt and his administration in the interest of social and business progress and who also appreciate and approve his extraordinary success in keeping the country from becoming involved in the European struggle.

Mr. Speaker, our good people also appreciate and approve our great President's work in effecting a safe and sane program of national defense. All who are well informed remember that in 1933 our Army and Navy were at low ebb, after 12 years of Republican misrule, and therefore they recognize the great strides and achievements of the President in building up the Army and creating the strongest Navy the world has ever known. Also, those who are well informed must credit the President with building up the air force which is, though not numerically as strong as other air forces, relatively the equal of the best.

Referring to the second part of the gentleman's statement in which he says that he cannot quite grasp my attitude, and he should, because he is a very intelligent gentleman, I will say, yes, I have introduced a strong bill which I believe is timely in the hope of stopping the subversive and un-American activities of the fifth columners. The gentleman says he cannot understand why I should introduce such a bill in view of the fact that I voted against the proposed granting of an additional $100,000 to the Dies committee. I say that I feel satisfied that I can satisfactorily explain to my fair-minded colleague what impelled me to oppose Mr. DIES' activities. In voting I did but follow, if I am not mistaken, a majority of Mr. DIES' own committee, who complained, and rightly so, that Mr. DIES had made unsupported allegations in interviews and speeches, all the time promising to prove them, but never doing so.

Although Mr. DIES' committee did investigate some of the Nazi practices, he did not do so painstakingly and thoroughly, and he did not follow reliable information that came to him from many sections of the country relative to the undependability of his informants, but, rather, he continuously, relentlessly, and, as it seemed to me, deliberately but without justification assailed and attacked worthy persons and stressed to an unwarranted degree the so-called communistic doings.

Please understand, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that I have no more respect or sympathy for the repulsive Communists than I have for the despicable Nazis, but I came to the conclusion, based upon reliable information furnished me, that for some unknown reason Mr. DIES permitted himself to be used, wittingly or unwittingly, in an attempt to improperly identify every progressive or new dealer as a Communist, and in many statements he charged outstanding men and women in private life, as well as many in high Government positions, with being connected with communism; but when demand was made upon him by members of his own committee to give the names of some of those he charged with being Communists, he was unable to do so. Consequently, I came to the conclusion that his efforts were aimed solely at weakening worthy progressive and New Deal policies and practices, and weakening labor organizations, and at the same time simply gloss over the real subversive and un-American activities of the Nazis and the Fascists. It is to be regretted that Mr. DIES has, to some extent, succeeded in what I believe to be improper conduct of his committee. If he had thoroughly exposed the real subversive activities, I am satisfied there would have been no need for my bill or any other action on the part of the Government or the States.

I am confident that the vast majority of the American people know and feel that the outstanding danger to our country comes from the Nazi source, which somehow or other seems to have, unfortunately, endorsement and even the cooperation of the Ku Klux Klan, as is shown by an article from today's Times-Herald, Washington, D. C., which reads as follows:

KLAN HAILS BUND; CITES "UNJUST STIGMA"

NEW YORK, August 6.—The Ku Klux Klan extended the hand of friendship yesterday to Fritz Kuhn's life work—the German-American Bund. Of the Nazi Hitler heilers, whose erstwhile "fuehrer" now reposes in Dannemora Prison, a Klan statement in the weekly Deutscher Weckruff and Beobachter said: "Our hearts and sympathies are extended to our fellow-Americans of German extraction to whom the stigma of enemy alien has been unjustly attached."

Is not that amazing? Must it not be condemned by every real, not professional, patriotic American?

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I think back to the machinations of the Silver Shirts and the Christian Front organizations who also have been cooperating with and are part and parcel of the Ku Klux Klan; and I wonder whether the leaders of these organizations might not be responsible for Mr. DIES' failure to proceed against the real "fifth columners" that are fed and inspired by Hitler-Nazi money here as well as in many Central and South American Republics.

But this is extremely hard for me actually to believe because Mr. DIES has assured me many times, with emphasis, of his uncompromising oppositive to and earnest fights against misled Ku Klux Klan activities.

I think I have made clear why I have opposed the Dies committee on un-American activities. I have not opposed proper purposes and plans of that committee, but I have opposed the manner in which this committee has functioned, its practical policies and procedures; the unjustifiable publicity traducing many worthy outstanding men and women by charging them with being Communists, under Mr. DIES' leadership.

I concede that my bill, H. R. 10289, is drastic, but I do not think anything is too drastic when it comes to protecting and safeguarding our beloved Nation in the existing emergency.

If there is any provision in the bill that would in any way seem to tend to deprive good American citizens or noncitizens of their constitutional rights in any degree, I wish to assure gentlemen of the House that I am willing to eliminate any such provision that might deprive any citizen or noncitizen of his right of free speech, freedom of peaceful assembly, and worship according to the dictates of one's conscience; but I do feel that we are faced with potentially real dangers, which I hope may not materialize. I learned, though, many years ago that a stitch in time saves nine.

I feel that emergency conditions demand that we adequately safeguard our democratic form of government, the American way of living, and the future of our beloved country, and that all those in our midst, whether native-born or naturalized citizens, should be given unmistakably to understand that conditions do not justify any degree of disloyalty and it cannot and must not be tolerated.

We know the methods of the "fifth columners" in Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and all other countries that have been ruthlessly deprived of their independence; and, unfortunately, there are some unbelievers in this country.

As for the foreign-born and those of foreign parentage, I have the utmost confidence that a vast majority of them will demonstrate their loyalty and patriotism, but we cannot any longer ignore the actual fact that we have in this country, as the result of a limited infiltration in the last 20 years, many Nazi sympathizers, many of whom, as I am informed, are here for the purpose of creating racial and religious discord. To those as to all others I will say that America, though not perfect, is the greatest and the best country in the world. [Applause.] If some of these misguided gentlemen are dissatisfied here and wish to give aid and comfort to our national enemies, whether foreign or domestic, they are not entitled to any consideration and should be dealt with summarily and should pick up their acquired belongings, leave the country of great opportunity that guarantees freedom and liberty, and return to the country or countries they prefer.

Those who came here after the late war and have a misconception of our form of government and American ways, let God speed them on their way whence they came.

I hope that I have in my blunt but sincere manner made my position clear, and I assure you that I have no desire to unduly injure or visit upon anybody by my bill a hardship.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, no doubt you have already heard the false charges that have been and are being circulated by these newcomers that the Germans here are being persecuted and discriminated against. This is not a fact. But may I ask, how long would an American citizen be permitted to remain in Germany if he should assail, conspire, and disseminate false or even true publicity against Hitler and, if in Italy, against Mussolini? Surely, any such American citizen, if not immediately deported, would in most instances be severely punished and thrown into a concentration camp.

The hundreds of letters that I originally received against the neutrality bill, and the hundreds of letters that I received from German organizations opposing aid to the Allies, letters and resolutions that I have received against national-defense legislation, and the disclosures of the activities of German consuls here and in South America, satisfy me that many of the German newcomers are here simply to create intolerance and to weaken our governmental structure. The general opposition in some groups to every utterance and action of President Roosevelt convinces me that there are hundreds of German agents in our midst who have infiltrated into this country, as I have stated, since Hitler began his program, as given in Mein Kampf. Only those who are part and parcel of this propaganda are finding fault with our defense program. They, with some misled Americans imbued with Hitlerism, are, to my mind, the real danger to our country. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the House to the title of this joint resolution? It is "To authorize the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice to conduct investigations in the interest of national defense, and for that purpose to permit wire tapping in certain cases." That is all there is to this resolution. It is not a political matter; it is not a partisan matter; it is a matter of national defense.

This was a live question in prohibition days. During prohibition Members like the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]—the author of this bill—and the chairman of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] bitterly opposed wire tapping, because it was used in enforcing the prohibition law.

The purpose of this resolution is to loosen up, if I may use the term, so far as wire tapping on the part of the Government is concerned, but only when, in the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, it is necessary to detect sabotage, "fifth column" activities, and matters of that kind; in short, in relation to the national defense.

For my part, I am going to vote for the rule and the resolution. That is all that is involved here. It is just a question of whether or not the Congress wants to loosen up and allow wire tapping to the extent that our legally constituted officers of the Department of Justice engaged in Federal investigations may tap wires, if and when in their judgment it is necessary for the best interests and the national defense of the country. It is a simple resolution and I hope it passes.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 3 minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, during the long, hard fight to repeal the eighteenth amendment and the prohibition laws, as the record reveals, I took a very active part with our present colleagues, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] in favor of such repeal and was actively opposed to wire tapping. They both opposed wire tapping by prohibition agents during that fight.

Do you Members of Congress realize that 28 States of the Union today, at this very hour, have laws on their statute books which make it a misdemeanor or a felony to tap telephone or telegraph wires? I respectfully submit this for consideration to those of you who talk in favor of States' rights and who wish to maintain the separate functions of the Federal and the State Governments. Now, let us look at the facts a moment.

I hold in my hand the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Olmstead v. The United States (277 U. S. 438), which I, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], talked much about during the prohibition-repeal fight. This is the wire-tapping case, coming down from the West, which was decided by a 5-to-4 decision of the United States Supreme Court on the question of the constitutionality of wire tapping. Today, with reference to the wire-tapping section of this bill—I am not opposed to the other section—I want to take my position as I took it then with the gentleman from Illinois, Brother SABATH, and the gentleman from New York, Brother CELLER, squarely behind the eminent Justice Brandeis, who delivered the notable, truly American dissenting opinion in that case of Olmstead against the United States. What did Justice Brandeis say in that opinion? From the opinion of Justice Brandeis in the case of Olmstead v. The United States (277 U. S. 438), I quote:

> If the Government becomes a lawbreaker it breeds contempt for law; it invites every man to become a law unto himself, it invites anarchy.

That is the statement of Justice Brandeis. Now, let us see what else the distinguished Justice said in that opinion from which I now quote, as follows:

> Applying to the fourth and fifth amendments the established rule of construction, the defendants' objections to the evidence obtained by wire-tapping must, in my opinion, be sustained. It is, of course, immaterial where the physical connection with the telephone wires leading into the defendants' premises was made. And it is also immaterial that the intrusion was in aid of law enforcement. Experience should teach us to be most on our guard to protect liberty when the Government's purposes are beneficent. Men born to freedom are naturally alert to repel invasion of their liberty by evil-minded rulers. The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in insidious encroachment by men of zeal, well-meaning but without understanding

Mr. Speaker, Justice Brandeis had this to say in that same opinion:

> Decency, security, and liberty alike demand that government officials shall be subjected to the same rules of conduct that are commands to the citizen. In a government of laws, existence of the government will be imperiled if it fails to observe the law scrupulously. Our Government is the potent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example. Crime is contagious. If the Government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for law; it invites every man to become a law unto himself; it invites anarchy. To declare that in the administration of the criminal law the end justifies the means—to declare that the Government may commit crimes in order to secure the conviction of a private criminal—would bring terrible retribution. Against that pernicious doctrine this Court should resolutely set its face.

I call upon my Democratic colleagues to adhere to the fundamental enunciation of American democracy as expounded by that notable democratic jurist, Mr. Justice Brandeis, of the United States Supreme Court, and to follow Justice Brandeis not the gentleman from New York, Judge CELLAR, and the gentleman from Illinois, Judge SABATH, who followed Justice Brandeis with me during the long, hard fight against prohibition tyranny. Now let us turn to something else.

Mr. Speaker, I now read from a letter written to me by Mr. Hoover, who heads the Federal Bureau of Investigation today. Mr. Hoover had this to say on January 13, 1931, when he was also Director of the F. B. I.:

> You are advised that section 14 of the Manual of Rules and Regulations of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, as issued under date of June 17, 1930, reads as follows: "Wire tapping, entrapment, or the use of any illegal or unethical tactics in procuring information will not be tolerated by the Bureau."
> I might state, for your information, that this provision has appeared in the manual of rules and regulations since March 1, 1923.

Mr. Speaker, that is Mr. Hoover, who, we are now told, is now asking for the enactment of this bill to authorize and permit wire tapping.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I yield to our very able and distinguished colleague.

Mr. MICHENER. Unquestionably that is the regulation. All Mr. Hoover and the Department of Justice are asking in the interest of national defense is permission to modify that regulation to the extent mentioned in this resolution.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Yes; we have been and will be asked to enact a great many laws and make many appropriations in the name of national defense. When Stalin established his secret wire-tapping Ogpu it was claimed to operate in the interest of national defense. When Hitler established his eavesdropping, window-peeping, wire-tapping Gestapo to interfere with the rights and liberties of the people he said that it was in the interest of national defense.

Now it is proposed to establish a New Deal wire-tapping Gestapo or Ogpu in the United States, in violation of the fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution, in the name of national defense.

I do not propose to support this proposal which is part of the New Deal program to establish a dictatorship in the United States. A wire-tapper destroys the sanctity of the home and invades the person and his house secretly and without warning, and subjects the privacies of life and the homes of our people to public scrutiny in violation of the fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution, which I now include in my remarks.

CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

AMENDMENT IV

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

AMENDMENT V

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

I hold in my hand the hearings held on the Department of Justice appropriation bill for 1931 and I quote Mr. Hoover, the Director of the F. B. I., from page 63, as follows:

Mr. TINKHAM. Is any of your appropriation spent for wire-tapping?

Mr. HOOVER. No, sir. We have a very definite rule in the Bureau that any employee engaging in wire-tapping will be dismissed from the service of the Bureau.

Mr. TINKHAM I am very much pleased that that is so.

Mr. HOOVER. While it may not be illegal, I think it is unethical, and it is not permitted under the regulations by the Attorney General.

Mr. Speaker, I rest my case on the testimony of Mr. Hoover and Justice Brandeis.

Mr. MICHENER. Why, the very purpose of this resolution is to make it legal in the present emergency.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under section 2 of the pending bill every telephone in the United States could be tapped in the name of national defense. I fought against the pernicious, sneaking, snooping, eavesdropping, window-peeping telephone tapping for many years, and I do not intend to lay down on the job today, even though the proposed authority to tap telephone wires is clothed in the robes of national defense. In these days in the interest of national defense it is essential more than ever to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States and maintain inviolate its provisions.

I also hold in my hand the Senate hearings on the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Burlew as Assistant Secretary of the Interior. This hearing reveals that the great self-styled liberal Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Harold Ickes, and his supersleuth, Mr. Glavis, who was in charge of a horde of Department of Interior gum-shoe artists, arranged for the wholesale tapping of telephones in violation of the law of the land.

Mr. Glavis testified that he conferred with Mr. Ickes and Mr. Ickes, that great liberal, whose only liberality is in spending other people's money, authorized and ordered that unlawful wire tapping. Mr. Glavis testified in these hearings that he and Harold Ickes made arrangements to tap the telephone wires in the Interior Department in violation of existing law. I call upon all my colleagues to arouse from indifference and lethargy. Do not wake up some fine day and find all your rights and liberties taken away as they have been taken by dictators in many foreign lands. If this bill is enacted, it will permit the agents of the Department of Justice to tap every telephone in every office and home in the United States in the name of national defense.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman does not believe that every home in America commits crime and carries on activities against the Government?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Before the gentleman came here, we had these whisky-snooper Federal prohibition agents who tapped the telephones of many people's homes, whether they were violating the law of the land or were not.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman realize that this law cannot be put into effect until the Attorney General gives specific permission to make this type of investigation?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Oh, I realize that, but if the Attorney General is not different from some of those who serve in the New Deal Cabinet with him, such as Mr. Ickes, who in violation of the criminal law had a horde of wire tappers operating in the Nation's Capital, we cannot expect much protection from a New Deal Attorney General.

Mr. Speaker, I rest my case on the testimony of Justice Brandeis and Mr. Edgar Hoover's testimony in 1931, and I sincerely hope you gentlemen will not be fooled and led astray because of the national defense window dressing on this bill. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, this resolution seems to have been reported in my name; therefore I will endeavor to briefly explain the bill to you.

At the outset may I say that I have no particular interest in the proposal. It simply does that which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] says it does. It modifies or changes the law against wire tapping and puts activities of this character within the discretion of the Attorney General.

I regret that the Dies Committee had to come in for a raking over. So far as I am concerned, I think that committee has done a splendid job. I think the country as a whole believes that the committee has done a good job. I hope that additional money will be provided so that the committee may carry on the work it has been doing.

To my friend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] may I say that it just happens that consistency is no longer necessarily a virtue. I do not like wire tapping and I do not believe that there is any Member of this House who likes it, but the Committee on the Judiciary which gave considerable study to this proposal made a finding favorable to the adoption of the bill. Representatives of that committee came before the Rules Committee, and, as I recall, the disclosure was made that there was no opposition to the bill within the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], on behalf of the Judiciary Committee, has presented a very clear and understandable report on this bill. In the second paragraph the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] says that—

This bill would confer on the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice authority to conduct investigations, subject to the direction of the Attorney General, to ascertain, prevent, and frustrate any interference, or attempt, or plans to interfere with the national defense by sabotage, treason, seditious conspiracy, espionage, violations of the neutrality law, or in any other manner.

The third paragraph of this report reads as follows:

Section 2 of the bill would provide that the provisions of section 605 of the Communications Act of 1934, which has been construed as barring the admissibility of evidence obtained by the use of wire tapping, shall not be applicable to investigations authorized by the act. This provision of the instant bill, however, is safeguarded by a restriction that it can be utilized only in cases in which the Attorney General finds probable cause to believe that one of the offenses defined in the act has been, is being, or is about to be committed; and by a further restriction that evidence so obtained may be used for no other purpose, and may be introduced in evidence only in connection with a prosecution for an offense defined in the act and then only after a production of the Attorney General's certificate containing the foregoing finding.

I think it fair for us to credit the Attorney General with a disinclination to bring about a total disregard of the act which is by this bill sought to be amended. The Attorney General, in his letter to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], replied to a request that he make an expression of his opinion on the resolution, and in that letter stated as follows:

In a statement made by me to the press on March 15, 1940, the following observations are found on this general subject:

"In a limited class of cases, such as kidnaping, extortion, and racketeering, where the telephone is the usual means of conveying threats and information, it is the opinion of the present Attorney General, as it was of Attorney General Mitchell, that wire tapping should be authorized under some appropriate safeguard. Under the existing state of the law and decisions, this cannot be done unless Congress sees fit to modify the existing statutes."

I wonder if there is anyone in this House who really takes serious issue with the Attorney General in the statement I have just read. It seems to me, as it seems to the gentleman from Michigan, the gentleman representing the minority on the Committee on Rules, that there can be no serious objection to the passage of the bill. Certainly there should be no objection whatever to the consideration of the bill. The Attorney General is a great lawyer and may be depended upon to exercise a sound discretion. He favors the bill because it will make for better law enforcement. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, no one can successfully accuse me of being unduly sympathetic toward the Attorney General or any other member of the New Deal administration, nor can anyone successfully charge that I believe in the granting of additional powers to any member of that official family. I have, of course, the highest respect for the ability of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], who never fails, who is always alert to speak in behalf of our constitutional form of government, a gentleman whose ability, patriotism, alertness, and industry have caused us all to listen when he takes the floor. But I wonder sometimes if he does not in his zeal to safeguard our constitutional liberties go a little too far. As he talked here this morning it seemed as though he were like the minister who closed his eyes in prayer while a fellow in the back seat was stealing the church furniture.

The Communists and the professional criminals and racketeers in the United States are always crawling behind the Constitution when the hand of the law reaches out and gets hold of them.

We all believe in the Constitution. It is regrettable that a former Attorney General, one Frank Murphy, and the President of the United States, Franklin Roosevelt, did not have more regard for its provisions when the sit-down strikers drove men from their jobs and took possession of private property in Michigan, when armed invaders brought civil strife to that State.

There is another group which believes in the Constitution only now and then—when the jail doors seem swinging open. They are not entitled to too much consideration. By that I do not mean that one charged with crime, even though he be an alien, a known Communist, attempting to overthrow this Government by force, should not have due process of law, as guaranteed by the Constitution. But I do say that we should not reserve all of our tenderness for the malefactor, nor should we give the Constitution a strained construction to protect enemies of our Government.

This bill today does not take away, as I understand it, anyone's constitutional rights. It is merely an amendment to a law which Congress has passed and which will enable the Department of Justice, when it brings to the bar of justice men charged with crime, to use evidence which it has obtained in a certain way.

No one would contend that an officer should not sit outside a building and eavesdrop—and no one likes eavesdropping—while criminals are engaged in perfecting a conspiracy.

No one should be compelled to give evidence against himself, but criminals who use public utilities should not be permitted to use those utilities for the furtherance of their criminal schemes.

Certainly, Congress has the right to limit the use of public utilities to lawful purposes and it is my understanding that the purpose of this amendment is to prevent the use of a public utility, the communications system, by criminals engaged in criminal acts.

If a bank robber, attempting to enter a bank, touches off the electric alarm, no one would criticize the officer who comes running with drawn gun.

If one who would destroy our Government uses a telephone or a telegraph wire installed only for lawful business, should he be protected in his criminal use?

We have appropriated billions of dollars. We have been twitted about voting for those appropriations this morning by some on the majority side, as you recall. We are going to be asked to conscript men, to take them from their homes. Just why, I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I ask it in all sincerity and kindliness, should we refuse to let the courts use evidence, even if it does come from wire tapping, if it would convict these professional criminals or the "reds" who are trying to overthrow our Government by force and through treason? Why protect criminals?

Why take a provision of the Constitution and use it as a shield for those engaged in criminal enterprises, rather than as a sword for the protection of the honest citizen?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I believe everybody should have the full protection of the Constitution. If the gentleman will read Justice Brandeis' opinion in the 5-to-4 decision in the wire-tapping case of Olmstead against United States, from which I have quoted, he will appreciate the necessity for safeguarding those constitutional rights. This bill is not limited to spies, to alien agents, to Communists and Nazis or any criminal class of people. Under this bill every telephone in the United States can be tapped in the name of national defense. I do not desire to help build up a New Deal Gestapo or Ogpu secret, unconstitutional espionage system in the United States.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, no.

The Department of Justice does not care anything about us or our activities or our communications unless we engage in acts or a conspiracy to overthrow our Government or to violate some Federal law.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mussolini, Stalin, and Hitler all started with and perfected their secret espionage system. This wire-tapping bill and the New Deal third-term "blitzkrieg" is a part of the New Deal program to Stalinize the United States. It is in violation of the fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution as Justice Brandeis stated and that is why I am opposed to it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I would rather have a domestic dictator than a foreign one, if the domestic dictator will protect us from the enemies within as well as from those without. We have had a dictator for the last 7 years. The New Dealers have forced one upon us, but, thank God, this country does not need one; I do not believe it wants one and it is my hope and prayer that we get rid of the present one at the next election in November. In any event, this bill, as I understand, applies only to those people who are carrying on treasonable activities against the United States. It looks to me as though the gentleman is taking under his wing here all those who are professional criminals. Why not give this power to the Attorney General to use the evidence he obtains—we have given him power before, or at least he assumes it—and to Mr. Hoover, in whom we have confidence, so that they can do some effective work against those who would overthrow our Government. I say to my Republican brethren here, we can repeal it next session. We will be in power then. If they do not use it right, we will take it back.

And no doubt Willkie will appoint Thomas E. Dewey, the racketeer's nemesis, as our next Attorney General. If he does, it may be that, instead of the Federal Housing Authority being busy on new buildings to house low-income groups; instead of erecting needless public buildings, the then Democratic minority may be asked to assist us in appropriating money for jails to take care of the ex-new dealers who have trifled with Federal funds; who have violated the Hatch Act; who have used relief money for political purposes. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 571) to authorize the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice to conduct investigations in the interests of national defense, and for that purpose to permit wire tapping in certain cases.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 571, with Mr. ROBINSON of Utah in the Chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The first reading of the joint resolution was dispensed with.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, you have before you the bill that has been under discussion for some little time. It is a very simple bill. It received the unanimous consent of all the members of the Judiciary Committee. It authorizes the Federal Bureau of Investigation to conduct certain investigations only in the interest of national defense, and for that purpose permits wire tapping.

If you will take your bill, you will find that the wire tapping to be conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice is to be used only when authorized by the Attorney General to prevent or frustrate any interference or attempts or plans to interfere with national defense in the following manner:

(1) By sabotage, treason, or seditious conspiracy, espionage, or violations of neutrality laws.

Now, what is sabotage?

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman did not finish that paragraph after "violations of neutrality laws."

Mr. CELLER. "Or in any other manner."

Mr. EBERHARTER. That, I think, is a most important part—"in any other manner." Can the gentleman explain to me just what that might cover?

Mr. CELLER. Yes. Those words "or in any other manner" are limited under judicial construction, as is always the case with general language of that character, to the specific language that precedes, so that if there are some variations or shadings of sabotage, treason, seditious conspiracy, espionage, or violations of neutrality laws, they may come under the provisions of the act, but there cannot be any abrupt changes from these specific provisions which precede the general language "or in any other manner." Those general words are frequently used in criminal statutes; and, incidentally, I may say to the gentleman that this bill was prepared by the Department of Justice and submitted to us with that explanation. Also examine my report on the bill and you will find the similar explanation.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I understand the Department prepared this bill, and, naturally, the Department is anxious to have its powers as broad as Congress will make them.

Mr. CELLER. No; I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. EBERHARTER. Under the explanation given by the gentleman, are not those five words redundant or are they not unnecessary—"or in any other manner"?

Mr. CELLER. No; there may be some variations from sabotage which may border on some other criminal statute, and unless you have that language you would have a statute which would be insufficient for the purposes of the Department of Justice.

Now, what is meant by sabotage? Sabotage is, in a way, the deliberate stoppage of work or slowing down by labor of defense work by the destruction of machinery. The word has a very interesting history. The word "sabot" in French means wooden shoe, and occasions arose where French employees were dissatisfied and they would throw a shoe, a "sabot," into the machinery to destroy the machinery or have it intermeshed in some way as to render the machinery ineffective. That type of sabotage has been used frequently to interfere with our national defense by destroying the machinery that makes armaments and arms.

Treason is defined in our Constitution. It is warring against the United States in the method defined in the Constitution.

Seditious conspiracy, as defined in the United States Code, title XVIII, section 6, is the overthrowing of the Government by force and violence.

Espionage is the obtaining of confidential or secret information relating to national defense and disclosing same to a foreign power or an enemy, like the disclosure, for example, of secret plans of our Army or our Navy. Disclosure of the newly invented bomb sight to a foreign power would be espionage.

Now, it is only in those cases, specifically enumerated, that the F. B. I. shall have the right to indulge in wire tapping, and, to make assurance doubly sure, that there would be no abuses of the privilege, the committee very carefully inserted section 2, which throws additional safeguards around this entire process. Firstly, there must be probable cause to believe there has been a violation of the specific laws enumerated in section 1, to wit, sabotage, treason, seditious conspiracy, espionage, or the violation of neutrality laws. In other words, Mr. Hoover, of the F. B. I., must have cause to believe there are such violations.

Secondly, he makes his report to the Attorney General, and the Attorney General must give a certificate. He must specifically certify as to the need of wire tapping; otherwise wires cannot be tapped.

Thirdly, the information cannot be used except in such an investigation and on trial after indictment or information; and there are dire penalties, I wish to say to the Members, under the old act of 1934, in the event of violations, and those penalties would be directed against Mr. Hoover or any of his agents if he does not follow carefully the arrangements made for him and laid down for him in this intended statute.

And, lastly, the evidence that is secured is not admissible in any court proceeding unless accompanying that evidence is a statement certified by the Attorney General that the tapping of wires was necessary for national defense. With these safeguards, I cannot conceive how there can be abuses.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. And it can only be done upon indictment.

Mr. CELLER. Of course. There must likewise be an indictment.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Under the law of the State of New York tapping telephone wires is a criminal offense, with a penalty, and I quote, "not to exceed 2 years imprisonment." The gentleman comes from the State of New York. Does he maintain that under this bill this Congress can grant authority to any Federal agency to willfully violate the law of the State of New York which provides a penalty of 2 years in the penitentiary for a violation of it?

Mr. CELLER. I am very glad that the gentleman has asked that question because the gentleman is not conversant with the law in the State of New York. Last year we had a constitutional convention in the State of New York and our constitution was revised and changed, and in respect to wire tapping it reads as follows (sec. 12, par. 2, adopted Nov. 8, 1938):

> The right of the people to be secure against unreasonable interception of telephone and telegraph communications shall not be violated, and ex parte orders or warrants shall issue only upon oath or affirmation that there is reasonable ground to believe that evidence of crime may be thus obtained, and identifying the particular means of communication, and particularly describing the person or persons whose communications are to be intercepted, and the purpose thereof.

In other words, under the Constitution of the State of New York, wire tapping is now permitted in the State of New York for the interception and frustration of any kind of crime, no matter what it may be. All that we ask in the pending bill is the right to have wire tapping in the interest of national defense, in the specific cases mentioned; so that we have this anomalous situation: A New York City detective, or a detective upstate in New York can tap wires by getting an ex parte order from the court, whereas the F. B. I. agent in New York cannot do a darn thing relative to tracking down those Nazi agents, these Communists, and these other agents of foreign powers. That is an anomalous situation which we are trying to avoid by this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I shall take 5 minutes more.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. So that the bill before us more nearly safeguards the rights of the people from wire tapping than does the constitution of New York.

Mr. CELLER. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. GWYNNE. Further answering the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], is it not the truth that in the Olmstead case, where the court held that evidence obtained by wire tapping was admissible and did not violate the fourth amendment, that the statute of Oregon where the case arose, prohibited wire tapping?

Mr. CELLER. That is true.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman is basing his argument upon the theory that it is an emergency, and this is for the self-preservation of the Government. When does that end, and when does it start? When the emergency ends, does this continue as a permanent law?

Mr. CELLER. We certainly are in an emergency now.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is right.

Mr. CELLER. We are in perilous times. The emergency would have to end when some declaration is made concerning it by the Congress.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If the emergency is ended tomorrow, does this end the statute?

Mr. CELLER. No. Then Congress would have to take suitable action, and I presume it would, and if the emergency is ended I am sure that we can trust Congress to take action which would repeal or make some changes in this particular act.

Certainly we should not continue ourselves in the position that we are now in, where foreign spies—and the country is loaded with them—are actually guaranteed the use of a public utility, the telephone and the telegraph, without interference, without any surveillance. That is the situation.

We are asked to put an additional safeguard upon wire tapping, namely, that there should be an order of a court. The minute you go with a motion before a court and say you want to run down this particular spy or this particular bund, these particular Mussolini agents, you then proclaim to the whole world what you are doing, and you frustrate the very attempt to run these men down, because you give them notice. Suppose you arrange to have it done ex parte, without notice, by submitting some sort of a petition to a Federal judge. But the court's secretary or aide would find out. You know "three men can keep a secret if two men die." And secrecy is the essence of the remedy.

We have very strange conditions existing in this country. For example, Maine, New Hampshire, Delaware, Vermont, Utah, Wyoming, Idaho, and Kansas each have but one Federal judge. Suppose that judge is ill. Suppose he is on vacation. Suppose he is in a distant part of the State, how are you going to get adequately, for all proper purposes, an ex parte order? The State of Montana has two judges. Note the great distance between the eastern and western termini in that State. You could not get to a judge in time. Therefore you destroy the very purpose of the statute by putting in that kind of a safeguard.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. WALTER. Was there any objection interposed at the time of the hearings to this measure?

Mr. CELLER. There were some objections made by one individual, namely, the attorney for the C. I. O.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Lee Pressman?

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Lee Pressman.

Mr. WALTER. What objection could Mr. Pressman possibly have to a measure of this sort? What activities is he engaged in that he is afraid might be unearthed?

Mr. CELLER. I think the question is very well put. I have great respect for Mr. Pressman, but in this particular he may be enthusiastically misguided. Even if labor or any other class of persons indulge in espionage or sabotage or treason, they certainly ought to be met with a remedy of this character. Certainly labor should have no fears as to this bill. I cannot conceive of any adequate or proper answer to the arguments made here today.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Pressman was objecting to the resolution before the committee wrote in section 2, with its protection.

Mr. CELLER. Yes. I am glad the gentleman reminded me of that.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. As written in its present form, I do not recall that Mr. Pressman expressed any opposition to it.

Mr. CELLER. I do not think that is exactly the case. He wanted safeguards and appreciated section 2, but I think he wished additional safeguards, as he put it, for labor.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I think we ought to have section 2 in there to protect people.

Mr. CELLER. It was because of Mr. Pressman's statement that we thought it might be well to put in those safeguards.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 more minute.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Does this law go any further than the ordinary law providing issuance of search warrants under certain circumstances for the apprehension of certain criminals?

Mr. CELLER. No; it does not.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. No greater requirement in this law than in that?

Mr. CELLER. That is right.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. In dealing with these particular subjects the committee feels, and I think rightly, that we ought to do just what this bill provides.

Mr. CELLER. Correct.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. We are not violating constitutional rights any more than we are in the issuance of a search warrant under certain circumstances.

Mr. CELLER. I will say the Supreme Court (Olmstead v. U. S., 277 U. S. 438) has determined that wire tapping is not a violation of the Constitution. After all, wire tapping is a sort of elongated form of eavesdropping. That is all it is.

Mr. HANCOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Pressman expressed his opposition to this bill in this statement, and it is a weak ground, it seems to me. He said:

> The innocent would be the ones to suffer. Certainly the spy, the one who is actually interfering with national defense or engaged in sabotage or espionage, when he knows that you can tap his wire is not going to engage in telephone conversation.

That is his opposition to the bill, but you and I know that if we are going to detect a ring of spies we have to pursue the methods used by the spies.

Mr. CELLER. Correct. Furthermore, Mr. Hoover told me personally that he is stumped; that these spies are in great numbers in the United States at this very moment, doing their foul and damnable work, undermining our morale, and interfering with our national defense. He says he cannot apprehend them and cannot get the proper evidence against them to convict them without wire tapping he needs. He urges, in his patriotic endeavor to do his duty, the passage of this act.

The Supreme Court in Olmstead v. United States (277 U. S. 438), held in 1928 that the tapping of telephone and telegraph wires by law-enforcement officers was not violative of the provisions of the fourth amendment relating to searches and seizures, in view of the fact that it did not involve a physical invasion of anyone's premises. It was deemed, in a way, merely a form of eavesdropping.

Section 605 of the Communications Act of 1934 (48 Stat. 1103) prohibited any person not authorized by the sender to intercept or divulge or publish any radio, telegraph, or telephone communication. This provision was recently construed by the Supreme Court as barring the introduction in evidence in court of any evidence obtained by tapping wires, Nardone v. United States (302 U. S. 379); Nardone v. United States (308 U. S. 338); Weiss v. United States (308 U. S. 321). Section 2 of the instant bill would relax the bar of the statute in respect to investigations for national-defense purposes indicated in the act. Such relaxation, however, is safeguarded by restrictions that would be effective in preventing possible abuses.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice has used wire tapping prior to the date of its prohibition only on infrequent occasions and solely in connection with the investigations of grave crimes, such as kidnaping and extortion. In fact we are informed most of these crimes could not have been solved without the right to tap wires.

The committee would hesitate to allow wires or short-wave messages to be tapped in times of normalcy. We are, however, in a national emergency. Some sacrifices must be made. Some rights may have to be yielded. Just as in a period of war, the writ of habeas corpus may be abrogated and certain inalienable rights temporarily suspended, so in times of danger and peril—although short of war—inroads must necessarily be made upon those rights, if our democracy is to be preserved.

We recognize that abuses can easily accompany the privilege of wire tapping, but we have the earnest assurance of the Attorney General and his immediate subordinates that the utmost care and caution will be exercised, and that there will be no abuses of this privilege. Especially do we call attention to the fact there must be no infringement of the rights of labor under the National Labor Relations Act and other similar statutes.

Assuredly, criminals and other persons inimical to the existence of our democratic government must be tracked down, and every reasonable means at the command of the Government should be exercised to that end. The usual, if not necessary method of communication used by the culprits and traitors aimed at by this bill are the telephone, the telegraph, and the radio short wave.

The so-called "fifth column" activities in a number of European countries make us pause and think. Our democracy must be implemented with means to protect itself against those who would overthrow it by force and violence, or by cooperation with a totalitarian government. To enable the chief Federal law enforcement agency to maintain surveillance of means of communications for that purpose, under the safeguards contained in the bill, is a proper precaution and at the same time would not unduly infringe on individual liberty. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I have no requests for time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice be authorized and directed to conduct investigations, subject to the direction of the Attorney General, to ascertain, prevent, and frustrate any interference or attempts or plans to interfere with the national defense by sabotage, treason, seditious conspiracy (as defined in U. S. C., title 18, sec. 6), espionage, violations of neutrality laws, or in any other manner.
> SEC. 2. The provisions of section 605 of the act of June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1103), shall not apply to investigations authorized by the provisions of this joint resolution, if the Attorney General finds that there is probable cause to believe that any violation of law described in section 1 hereof is taking place, has taken place, or may take place, and so certifies in writing.
> The information so obtained shall not be used for any other purpose than such investigation and shall not be admissible in evidence except in connection with a prosecution for an offense indicated in section 1 hereof, and then only on the production of said certificate in open court.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin: On page 2 strike out all of section 2.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I know that this bill will be passed, as many bills have been passed in the name of national defense. I am not afraid to stand alone, or practically alone, in opposition to it. When I first came to Congress in 1923 and during my 10 years' service prior to being washed out temporarily in the New Deal tidal wave of 1932, we could only find about 23 Members of Congress who would introduce or support a 2¾ percent beer bill and oppose wire tapping. During those 10 years I listened to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], orate eloquently on the floor of the House in opposition to the unconstitutional wire tapping; sneaking and snooping of the Federal prohibition agents. I am certainly surprised to see their change of position on a great fundamental constitutional principle today. During that 10 years they repeatedly quoted the decision of Justice Brandeis, an exceptionally fine declaration of the American conception of constitutional democracy, delivered in the wire-tapping case of Olmstead against the United States.

I stand today just where I stood in opposition to wire-tapping tyranny under prohibition. I do not intend to run to cover under a wave of propaganda and become part and parcel of a move to sovietize and Stalinize the United States and have a dictatorship established in our country under a third-term "blitzkrieg." I do not intend to assist in having a Gestapo or Ogpu secret police on the Federal pay roll violating the laws of more than 25 States of the Union, whose statutes make wire tapping a misdemeanor or a felony. The gentleman indicates that his State of New York has changed its law with reference to wire tapping, but during the long fight to prohibit wire tapping in prohibition cases the State of New York had a law on its statute books providing a 2-year penalty for wire tapping. The gentleman on the floor of the House then spoke very affectionately about that law. But even if New York has changed its law, there are more than 25 States of the Union which make it a misdemeanor or a felony to tap telephone or telegraph wires within the State. Notwithstanding those State laws, however, enacted under the Constitution of the United States, are we going to put our stamp of approval on a bill which will authorize one of Uncle Sam's gum-shoe artists to go out into those very States and violate the criminal anti-wire-tapping laws thereof? You can do that if you choose; I do not propose to do so. I propose to follow the Justice Brandeis conception of American constitutional democracy today, as I have in the past, with reference to wire tapping. I am firmly convinced that when this Stalinistic legislative monstrosity gets to the Supreme Court that the present members of that body will follow the views of Justice Brandeis and declare it unconstitutional.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. I understood the gentleman to say that the most despicable thing in the world was snooping.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. One of the most despicable things is tapping telephones in violation of a citizen's constitutional rights. Tapping telephones, window peeping, and closet eavesdropping are in the same class.

Mr. KELLER. Is it not still more despicable to conspire over the wires to overthrow the Government or interfere with its vital functions?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I do not say that it is not despicable to conspire to do treasonable acts. We live in a constitutional democracy under a Constitution which guarantees to the people certain sacred rights, liberties, and protections. According to my interpretation and Justice Brandeis' interpretation of the Constitution, which I previously quoted, the Constitution protects the people from wire tappers and gives the Congress no authority to authorize and permit wire tapping.

Mr. Chairman, a wire tapper destroys the sanctity of the home and invades the person and his house secretly and without warning and violates the fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I regret to find myself in disagreement with my good friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The pending amendment proposes to strike out section 2, the only section written into the bill to protect the innocent. If this resolution should be adopted without section 2 we would deprive the innocent of the protection they are entitled to.

What does section 2 provide? That there can be no wire tapping unless and until the Attorney General of the United States finds there is probable cause to believe that some violation described in section 1 of the bill is taking place, has taken place, or about to take place, and so certifies in writing. Mr. Pressman was concerned about protecting the innocent and section 2 was written into the bill by the committee to meet that very situation.

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. JONKMAN. Will the gentleman tell me whether or not it is true that wire tapping can be promiscuous under all circumstances except information so obtained cannot be used unless the Attorney General says that such a condition obtains?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. No; it cannot be promiscuous. The Attorney General must certify that sabotage, treason, seditious conspiracy, or espionage, or violation of the neutrality laws—one of these five things has been done, is being done, or about to be done.

Mr. JONKMAN. Does the gentleman mean to say that in every case in which wires are tapped there must be this certification by the Attorney General?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Absolutely, and it goes even further than that. It says that the information so obtained shall not be used for any other purpose than the investigation of these matters that strike at the very root of national defense, that they shall not be admissible in evidence except in connection with prosecution for an offense indicated in section 1 of the bill, and then only on the production of such certificate of the Attorney General in court.

My good friend from Wisconsin denounces wire tapping, and insists that it would invade the rights of our people. The Committee on the Judiciary very carefully protected the people of this country against improper or promiscuous wire tapping, yet my friend from Wisconsin offers an amendment to take out of the bill the only language in it that affords the innocent that protection.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I know that he wants to keep the record straight.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. My amendment removes the entire permissive wire-tapping provision from this bill, and the prohibition against wire tapping which is now on the statute books applies if the bill as amended by my amendment is enacted into law. I have been opposing wire tapping for many years. I believe that Justice Brandeis was positively correct in the position which he took in the wire-tapping case of Olmstead against the United States, from which I have quoted today.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, we must reach this great group of enemy aliens, and some of our own people, who engage in these treasonable and other acts to destroy our Government and who are using our telephone and telegraph lines in order to overthrow this Government, destroy our factories and shops, and cripple our national defense. These enemies use the telephone and telegraph to plot against our Nation and carry out their diabolical schemes. This bill only gives the Department of Justice the right to meet these criminal enemies on their own ground and bring them to justice.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the debate on this amendment and on the bill itself. I am not a lawyer; therefore I cannot approach it from the standpoint of legal training. However, I take a back seat to no one in regard to my respect for and loyalty to the Constitution of the United States. I am in favor of this bill and opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], which would emasculate the bill.

Some time ago I had occasion to make a study of the Constitution of the United States, a document which was framed in the closing days of the eighteenth century, and the Constitution of the latest State which has come into this Union. Arizona is the youngest member of the family. I find there is great similarity between the bills of rights in those two documents, but the more than a century intervening between the writing of the Bill of Rights of the Federal Government and that of my own State has caused many additions to be made in that of the State of Arizona. We call ours the declaration of rights. For instance, I find that certain things, undreamed of by the founders of this Republic, had come into being between 1787 and 1910 and the men who drafted the Constitution of Arizona found that they must be dealt with with the same wisdom if we can summon it, as the founding fathers dealt with the problems of human liberty and rights back in 1787. They safeguarded against evils then existing.

I recall once upon a time two religious leaders getting into a violent dispute as to whether the use of tobacco was proper on the part of Christians. One man declared that it must be all right because it was not forbidden by the Ten Commandments or in the Bible.

The other reminded him, of course, that the use of tobacco was unknown when the sacred literature was prepared.

There are safeguards against certain evils found in the newer Constitution not found in our ancient supreme law for obvious reasons. I may say in regard to wire tapping that if there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States mentioning it specifically, we can explain the omission easily on the ground that such was unknown to the men who wrote the fundamental law of our land. Principles remain, even if names change, and new names and acts are added through the years.

We have had to revise our Bill of Rights. It may be proclaimed that "the right to bear arms shall never be infringed," but we cannot take that too literally and permit gangsters to run our streets with sawed-off shotguns and that sort of thing. In other words, we must safeguard constitutional principles in the sense of justice under modern, changed conditions as living has become more complex. In this high-powered, scientific age, crime has outrun law. For that reason, this bill is a safe, sane modification of the fundamental law of the land. I would make a distinction between those constitutional principles which are eternal verities, or those "ancient landmarks, which we must not remove," and some of the temporary provisions found in the Constitution of the United States. The Bill of Rights must not be used as a shield for evildoers.

I want to give our citizens full protection and even aliens all the safeguards which our treaty regulations provide for them and which the Constitution of our country and the laws of humanity make necessary for them, but the defense of our country comes first in times like these. We must not let criminals, high or low, alien or domestic, have a free hand. Even though it were not in this time of war emergency, I would still favor giving the Department of Justice the right which this bill does give it. I have great confidence both in the effectiveness and justice of our Federal Bureau of Investigation.

For the reasons set forth above, I ask that this nullifying amendment be voted down and that the bill be passed.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROBINSON of Utah, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the joint resolution (R. J. Res. 571) to authorize the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice to conduct investigations in the interests of national defense, and for that purpose to permit wire tapping in certain cases, pursuant to House Resolution 537, he reported the same back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks which I made today in the Committee of the Whole, and to include therein excerpts from decisions of notable jurists and a few excerpts from the Constitution of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two reports on the financial condition of our country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. SHEPPARD, for 10 days, on account of official business.

To Mr. MARCANTONIO, for yesterday and today, on account of illness.

To Mr. CLARK, for 3 days, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WHELCHEL, asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a short clipping.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I was entirely mistaken in telling a great many Members that the so-called lawyer's fee bill would come up this afternoon. I had in my pocket a list given me by the Clerk of the Committee on Rules which stated that a rule had been granted on this bill, but I find that is not true; so I do not believe there is any other business for today.

The SPEAKER. Under a previous special order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, the President has issued a call to all States and Congress to join him in fighting the destructive activities of saboteurs and in uncovering the men and organizations that are responsible for "fifth column" activities in this country. This order is commendable. For, in spite of the fact that we have a congressional committee which is supposed to investigate subversive, un-American activities, groups guilty of such activities have grown immensely in membershp and power in the last few years.

Since 1933 I have tried to awaken this country and Congress in particular to the danger the penetration of such subversive groups constitutes to our political and social way of living as a free people. But apparently little attention was paid to my plea, and it was only after great difficulty that I was able to bring about the creation of a committee to investigate some of the charges I had brought against well-functioning, foreign-subsidized, subversive groups in this country. The work of the committee, which was ably guided by its chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Congressman JOHN W. MCCORMACK, was terminated before its task was finished because certain influential groups in the country and certain Members of this body did not want such an investigation to be carried on. For several years the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, of which I have the honor to be chairman, has been pleading with Congress and the Rules Committee to grant them the power of subpena so that they could investigate further some information which had been brought to their attention which in their opinion would disclose the activities of groups working against the interests of this country. There were a number of witnesses who had important information to give but who refused to appear before the committee unless immunity was granted them. Even though the committee unanimously passed a resolution asking for this power they were unable to get it because certain members of the all-powerful Rules Committee did not wish them to go on with this investigation.

Since 1933, when I returned from a trip to Germany, where I was able to observe the propaganda methods used by the Nazi authorities, I have been warning the country that Hitler agents, by creating race hatred and intolerance, will try to array Americans against their fellow Americans, thus weakening our people from within. The present antialien hysteria which is responsible for most of the antialien legislation introduced in both Houses of Congress is one of the direct outgrowths of the dissemination of distrust among our people. Instead of attacking peace-loving, law-abiding aliens, we should use all methods at our command to unmask the men and organizations, whether they be directed from within or from without, who seek to undermine our democratic form of government and who seek to force upon our people the alien ideologies of foreign dictators. This, in my opinion, is one one the greatest emergencies ever faced by our country. There are a number of domestic groups which, by hiding behind protestations of American patriotism, try to do the work which foreign groups which could be detected might not be able to do as successfully. While they use their meetings and gatherings for spreading the gospel of foreign dictators, while their speakers try to incite their followers to acts of violence against their fellow citizens who still believe in the principles of democracy, they have the effrontery to claim protection under our Constitution, which Constitution they insult with every word they utter.

Much has been stated, Mr. Speaker, about this problem, both on the floor of the Congress and in the press, but very little has been accomplished in eradicating this evil. No doubt you have heard the charges made by a number of Members of the House, as well as the Senate, about the operations of so-called "fifth columnists." But has anything actually been done or been recommended to the Congress to put a stop to these subversive activities? In my opinion, nothing constructive has been done. This is an emergency, a serious emergency. I know the President is in full sympathy with a program designed to rid our country of spies and saboteurs. I know the great Attorney General is doing his job honestly and faithfully, and I know we can rely upon J. Edgar Hoover, in the Department of Justice, to do a real job. However, we do not have the proper laws to enable these men to act in such an emergency. I recommend strongly that this Congress provide them with laws to meet the situation.

No. 1. We must immediately destroy and do away with the so-called Nazi camps in this country, and they total about 30 or 31 in number. In these camps they practice, teach, and breed hate and intolerance. They use these camps for drilling and training of potential "fifth columnists." These camps have no place in this country because they are foreign to our principles, foreign to our form of government, and destructive instead of helpful to the Government. In times like this I think we ought to make it a punishable crime to wear foreign uniforms and foreign military emblems or to parade on our highways in celebrating the victories of a foreign dictator. You simply have to make up your mind to face the problem realistically.

On July 21, 1939, I introduced a bill (H. R. 6940) to prohibit the wearing of certain foreign uniforms, and for other purposes. This bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I have definite proof and evidence to present to that committee showing that Nazi uniforms are being brought into this country and certain American citizens of German blood are compelled to wear them when they attend the conferences at these so-called Nazi camps.

After many months of appealing to the Committee on Military Affairs, I found that I could not get any action at all. They were not in sympathy with that kind of legislation. I requested some action and I received a letter from the clerk of that committee. This is what he had to say:

> The chairman has requested me to acknowledge receipt of your letter of July 6 in the interest of H. R. 6940, to prohibit the wearing of certain foreign uniforms, and for other purposes, and to advise you that all bills of this nature were tabled by the full committee.

I then wrote another letter to the chairman, which letter was dated January 17, 1940, and received a reply on January 27 advising me that the matter will be called to the committee's attention. I never heard from them again.

In other words, one cannot even get a hearing before a committee to present evidence of the sabotage and conspiracy existing in the United States by means of which these uniforms were being brought in here and Americans were being compelled to pay $18 for them and to wear them at Nazi camps in this country. This great committee did not even find it necessary to give a colleague a hearing. They tabled this bill and, as they say, other bills without even going into the facts of the matter. This is the kind of cooperation one gets in trying to purge subversive activities.

Let me call your attention to something else. In the last 6 or 8 months, ever since this war began, there have been brought into this country certain moving-picture films from Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy. There has not been one educational film among them. Every film that has been brought in here has portrayed the greatness of the Nazi-Fascist Governments. Every one of these films that has been brought in here has been shown in certain sections of my city, as well as other cities that I could name, and I wish the Members of the Congress could go there and see the difference in reaction when they show a picture dealing with our country and when they show a picture depicting the greatness of the Fuehrer, Mr. Hitler, and Mr. Mussolini. The crowd just goes wild whenever anything about Germany and Italy is shown. I say to you that pictures of this type which incite the masses of our people in these times when we are trying to clean house of "fifth columnists" should be more carefully censored because they are not doing the country any good. I think we have been very lax in allowing these pictures to come in because they are not educational. They do not show anything but glorification of war, destruction, and the killing of human beings by the dictators. Every one of these pictures is along the same lines, namely, the justification of force for the glory of the Fuehrer. By the way, if you do not have the price, you can see these pictures for nothing because admittance is free. It must cost a lot of money to prepare these pictures. I wonder who is paying for it? Here is an article, taken from the New York World-Telegram of August 5, which describes the reaction of the audience in one of the German theaters:

[From the New York World-Telegram of August 5, 1940]

YORKVILLE, COOL TO ROOSEVELT, APPLAUDS HITLER IN WAR FILM—EIGHTY-SIXTH STREET AUDIENCE MOVED BY SIGHT OF THE SWASTIKA FLYING OVER FRANCE

(By Allan Keller)

The blond girl in the glassed-in booth said the newsreel would start at 1:40 p. m. Said it in perfect English without a trace of accent. Outside the sun shone brightly on restaurant and delicatessen windows. It might have been Grand Rapids or Dallas or Salt Lake City, but it was Eighty-sixth Street, Yorkville's main drag.

Inside the Eighty-sixth Street Garden a German screen romance, with English subtitles and German dialogue drew to a close and the lights went up. Perhaps 400 men and women, in shirt sleeves, house dresses, and other unpretentious costumes shifted about in their seats. Then the American newsreel started.

SILENCE GREETS ROOSEVELT

Lead item on the reel was a view of President Roosevelt's visit to the Navy Yard at Portsmouth, Va., and scenes of shell manufacture in the United States Arsenal at Frankford, Pa. The audience was silent. Silent with the oppressive heaviness that greets a speaker when he says the wrong thing.

There was a horse race at Santa Anita, a glimpse of the tennis matches at Southampton, and a fashion parade. The audience sat immobile. Only Lew Lehr's antics brought a ripple of laughter which died out before it really started.

Then came the piece de resistance—the German newsreel released by U. F. A. It started with a bit of pageantry in Sweden and a scene or two of a boat trip in Denmark. There was a trotting race at a track outside Berlin and the audience stirred as if some of them recognized the scene.

APPLAUD WAR SCENES

As the first wind of a storm sets the trees to stirring before the heavier blasts tear at the forests, so this scene of the trotting horses came before shots of Nazi field artillery and of dive bombers over the little villages of Picardy. The audience became restless, and when a French plane was knocked from the sky to plunge earthward in a plume of black smoke the first applause came from the newsreel watchers.

Well-paced and well-timed was the German newsreel. Starting slowly it moved ahead with increasing tempo and seemed to pave the way for the appearance of Adolf Hitler, on his way to the railway car in Compiegne Forest, where the French formally sued for peace.

GREET HITLER

Hitler's picture on the screen evoked fresh outbursts of applause. The Fuehrer grimaced in his pretty way as an officer handed him a regimental book to autograph, and the Yorkville audience was radiantly happy. He studied campaign maps with the bulbous Goering and with von Reichenau, and the handclapping echoed and reechoed in the theater.

Swiftly then the newsreel moved through scenes of Nazi soldiers at hand grenade practice, showing them tossing the "potato mashers" over the brink of a hill; of swift torpedo boats ferrying soldiers across a river in Belgium, and of rubber boats like those that helped spell ruin in the polders of Holland. Messerschmitts darted in and out of the clouds, and machine gunners rattled their belts of death through the light weapons. This was the meat of the picture, and the audience loved it.

There was a shot of the French battle monument at Verdun but a Swastika banner unrolled down its face, and the graven words were blotted out. This brought more applause.

NO GRUESOME SCENES

Here were no battle scenes, no mangled bodies to make women think of relatives facing death and no shots of the shattered homes in Hamburg, Essen or Dortmund. It was war—but the war of generals behind the lines, in field headquarters and on the sleek battlewagons in the North Sea.

A glimpse of the Cathedral in Strasbourg, Alsace, and the words of the announcer in German pointing out that this had once been a German city brought forth renewed clapping.

So, finally the newsreel drew to its end with scenes of long rows of Nazi banners flapping in the breeze and of church bells ringing from a dozen towers. From the sound track came the music of the German anthem, Deutschland Uber Alles.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. What particular picture is the gentleman referring to? Will the gentleman explain that for our own enlightenment?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Well, I cannot give you the name of any particular picture, but in the last months there have been at least 10 of them brought in under the heading "The Fuehrer Conquers" or "The Leader Will Conquer." They portray these war scenes and show these death pictures to the public and the masses in justification of Hitler's aggression, and as I said a moment ago, you do not have to have the price if you want to go in and see the pictures.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. I came in just a little late and I beg the gentleman's pardon for that, but did the gentleman refer at all to the picture that we looked at in the old House Office Building some nights ago? Is that now being released for public consumption?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I think so, but I am not talking about that particular picture. I am talking about pictures that are brought directly from Germany and Fascist Italy for the sole purpose of inciting the people and of impressing them with the power and leadership of a destructive group of people who are, as they state, going to conquer the world.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman is referring to the pictures that have been released, apparently, through the regular picture organizations?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; I do not believe that they were released by American companies. They were made on the battlefields of Europe where the war is on and are definitely biased in their approach.

Mr. STEFAN. How are they released in this country?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Frankly, I do not know and I think that we ought to look into the matter.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman misses my question. Who is releasing these pictures commercially for the general public to see?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They have their Nazi saboteurs——

Mr. STEFAN. But they are not in the regular moving-picture houses?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes; they bring them into the regular moving-picture houses and give them to the operators in certain areas to present, and it does not cost them anything. This is done just to create sympathy for their cause, and we ought to stop it.

Mr. STEFAN. If the gentleman will yield further, I understand the picture we looked at the other night in the old House Office Building was brought in here by M-G-M. Is that correct?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I did not see the picture the gentleman is referring to.

Mr. STEFAN. You refer to other pictures? They must be released through some exhibitors.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Not necessarily; they may be brought in from Germany through diplomatic channels, and in some way they find their way into certain sections and into certain moving-picture houses. Of course, some of them might have been released by some exhibitors.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. THILL. I believe this propaganda should be condemned bitterly, and I think also that not only the German propaganda films but the Fascist propaganda films and also the British films should be kept out. There was a picture called The Lion Has Wings, which was nothing but pure British propaganda. Does not the gentleman feel that that should be done away with likewise?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If we consider this an emergency, it seems to me that we should do away with a lot of things that do not belong here. These are not educational pictures for the benefit of our population. They are war pictures, prepared especially for home consumption and for the United States. In fact, a few weeks ago the police had to go in to rescue one single American who stood up and resented the showing of such biased pictures. The audience finally threw him out. This illustrates the nature and the tension of the crowd.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding for 2 minutes. Is the gentleman asking for any more than that?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am asking for 5 minutes.

Mr. FISH. I object to 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from New York is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. We should withdraw the privilege of second- and third-class mail from people and organizations that use the United States mails to distribute their vicious propaganda material which seeks to destroy the very foundations of our form of government. If this should not be possible, I would suggest that such organizations be forced to state the contents of their publications on the cover of the envelopes so as to show the Government and the people that these publications are published for propaganda purposes. Misrepresentation of contents should be prosecuted, because the people who preach and practice un-Americanism ought to be registered with the State Department to show that they are in that business, and that they are sending out this particular kind of propaganda.

Mr. STEFAN. Oh, they are registered now.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They are not registered at all. The only registration the State Department has is the one the McCormack committee recommended, and that is the registration of foreign agents. I am talking about domestic and foreign persons that use the second-class mail, not for business purposes but for the purpose of distributing anti-Semitic and un-American propaganda in this country.

Mr. STEFAN. I believe if the gentleman will visit the State Department he will find that they are doing a very good work in that respect.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am not criticizing the efficiency of the State Department but the inefficiency of our postal laws. The law ought to be amended.

Mr. STEFAN. I agree with the gentleman that that is not safeguarded, and it ought to be; but the State Department has done a great work.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I went before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and presented a plan that I thought was a good plan, and I got no action whatever.

Mr. STEFAN. Has the gentleman discussed it with the State Department?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; I have not. I think this is a legislative problem which should be handled by Congress. Congress and the people of this country must act and act before it will be too late. Americans must forget their political differences and unite in the fight to preserve their heritage of freedom of thought and freedom of action.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

WHY FINANCE INCREASED AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION WHILE WE ALREADY FINANCE DECREASED AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION?

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include my statement at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, the following tables show the amount of money expended and the acreage put under irrigation since the beginning of these federally financed projects:

CHART NO. 1.—Department of the Interior, Bureau of Reclamation, expenditure by fiscal years (construction cost)

Fiscal year:
1920	$3,570,755
1921	6,244,200
1922	6,247,205
1923	7,991,039

1924	$8,565,850
1925	7,610,030
1926	6,354,147
1927	5,189,026
1928	6,966,449
1929	7,898,305
1930	8,611,397
1931	13,037,306
1932	26,806,669
1933	25,207,007
1934	26,904,121
1935	43,828,646
1936	40,522,311
1937	57,742,182
1938	59,821,895
1939	72,218,668
1940	90,000,000
Yearly average appropriation before the New Deal	8,853,000
Yearly average appropriation under the New Deal	52,030,000

We appropriate millions not only to control production but also millions to buy up surpluses, millions for export bounties, and continue to appropriate additional millions to increase the agricultural production of our country. While $3,000,000,000 has been paid as a subsidy to agriculture the past 7 years, the farmers have $6,000,000,000 as their share of the increased public debt to be repaid by them with interest added.

[1] Includes projects constructed by the United States and those for which supplemental water is furnished from storage works built by United States.
[2] Estimated.

It should be borne in mind that the 3,078,072 acres under irrigation represent less than 1 percent of the 341,000,000 acres of cropland harvested each year in the United States. It should also be recorded in this connection that the $119,000,000—last 5-year average—of the total crop value from irrigated land represents over 2 percent of the national value of farm crops average of $5,691,000,000—average of 1935–39 without the subsidy payments which will have to be repaid, with interest, by the farmers of this country.

In all fairness, it must be plainly stated that these funds are supposed to be recovered by the Federal Treasury, although large losses have been entailed by the Federal Government during these years.

I am not questioning the wisdom of appropriating funds for the purpose of putting lands under irrigation. I am not speaking for irrigation or against irrigation as a system of crop production. In fact, having lived in an area that has suffered from droughts and is still suffering the effects of the droughts of the past 10 years, I am personally sympathetic to the benefits to be obtained by this method of farming.

The question I wish to discuss is, Why should these huge appropriations have been made during the past 7 years, when everyone is crying about a surplus of agricultural products?

The foregoing tables bring up the following questions:

First. Why should we appropriate $500,000,000 a year under the guise of soil conservation, which is really crop control, in an effort to raise agricultural prices when we appropriated six times more per annum for putting new lands under irrigation during the past 8 years than we did before the New Deal?

Second. Is not the present soil-conservation program really misleading? Is it not true the most fertile farm in America can be ruined and be depleted in its fertility and still have the owner get New Deal checks for conserving the fertility?

Third. Is it not time that someone take time out and study up a little on soils and soil chemistry, enough to know what elements of fertility should be conserved? Or is the main purpose to conserve the New Deal?

Fourth. If anyone is sincerely interested in conserving the fertility of the soil of this Nation, would it not be well to go slow on putting more land under irrigation and leave this land for future generations? At least, would it not sound reasonable to leave this land in its natural state until the time the Government did not have to take money out of the Federal Treasury to control the crop production of land already under cultivation?

Fifth. Should not these appropriations be curtailed until the Federal Government did not have to pay an export bounty of 25 cents per bushel on wheat and $7.50 a bale on cotton in order to get rid of it?

Sixth. With millions of bushels of wheat and corn on hand and millions of bales of cotton in storage with loans in excess of the market price, would it not be using a little common horse sense to curtail these appropriations which put large acreages of really productive land under irrigation?

Seventh. Why should we appropriate money from the Federal Treasury for a little over a third of the crops in an effort to give them somewhere near parity when at the same time we appropriate millions to put more land under heavy production, as we have done in the irrigated acres? Although this is my first term in Congress, I am happy to think that I have at least been able to equalize and reduce the interest burden of the farmers of this country to an extent that represents a saving of tens of thousands of dollars each year to the farmers of my district and an annual saving of millions of dollars to the farmers of the Nation.

Eighth. Is not this just one more of the cross-purposes of the New Deal? Does not the New Deal philosophy call for funds to control a situation, more funds to stimulate the situation, and then more and more funds to control the situation they have themselves stimulated or caused?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in three different particulars and to include therein a list of the Federal expenditures and loans made in three different countries in my district from March 4, 1933, until June 30, 1939.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on three subjects.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after disposition of business on the Speaker's table and any other special orders that have been entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order of the House heretofore entered the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is recognized for 30 minutes.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND CONSCRIPTION

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time this afternoon because I expect to be absent for several weeks attending the war maneuvers in the northern part of New York as a colonel in the Reserve Corps and as umpire in these war games. I may be a lone voice crying in the wilderness, but, nevertheless, I desire to take this opportunity to make some comments on the pending draft or conscription bill and to urge Congress to exhaust every possibility of the American volunteer system before resorting to the European war or conscription system.

The question of national defense is one of the greatest issues before the country at the present time, second only to the major issue of keeping America out of foreign wars. Not many years ago in this country the very word "conscript" would raise a shudder in the minds of free Americans. Back in 1900 the Democratic Party in its national platform had this to say about militarism and conscription:

MILITARISM OPPOSED

We oppose militarism. It means conquest abroad and intimidation and oppression at home. It means the strong arm which has ever been fatal to free institutions. It is what millions of our citizens have fled from in Europe. It will impose upon our peace-loving people * * * an unnecessary burden of taxation and will be a constant menace to their liberties. * * * This Republic has no place for a vast military service and conscription.

THE NATIONAL GUARD

In time of danger the volunteer soldier is his country's best defender. The National Guard of the United States should ever be cherished in the patriotic hearts of a free people. Such organizations are ever an element of strength and safety. For the first time in our history * * * there has been a wholesale departure from our time-honored and approved system of volunteer organization. We denounce it as un-American, undemocratic, and unrepublican, and as a subversion of the ancient and fixed principles of a free people.

The people in this country came over here to enjoy their civil rights and liberties and to get away from militarism and autocracy. In the World War we who fought on the battlefields of France were told that we were fighting against both autocracy and militarism. It would be a sad travesty if now, after 22 years, we should import identically the same European military and war system of conscription which has been largely responsible for the continuous wars between Germany, France, and Italy.

These extracts regarding militarism and conscription from the Democratic platform of 1900 are just as true and sound today as 40 years ago. I submit to both Democrats and Republicans alike that abhorrence of conscription in America is exactly the same today as it was at the beginning of the century. I believe every Member of Congress is in favor of adequate national defense, a Navy second to none, a Navy that is the largest in the world or maybe twice as large as any other in the world; a huge air force of approximately 20,000 or 25,000 planes, and a large Regular Army and a large National Guard combined between 800,000 and 1,000,000. That ought to give us absolute national defense, total national defense against any one enemy or against all possible enemies combined.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Now you have made a very fine statement and I agree with you, but who is going to take care of these armaments—the ships and the planes? We have got the planes and we have got the ships and we have got everything ready to go. Who is going to take care of it?

Mr. FISH. Well, we are having no trouble, I will say to the gentleman, in manning our Navy. Every quota has been filled and all the volunteers asked for have been forthcoming and our Navy now has all the men it needs. Although we have few airplanes—we have perhaps some on order—we only have about four or five thousand airplanes on hand, 50,000 young Americans have already volunteered—selected young Americans, who must have 2 years college training even to volunteer, have already volunteered, so we have no difficulty there in manning our air force now or in the future, no matter how large we, the Congress, may decree that it should be. When it comes to the Army—and the reason I am speaking today, as I said, is because I am leaving tomorrow to act as an umpire at the Army war games in northern New York. I realize that many Members of Congress are politically on the spot in regard to the conscription bill. I see no reason for those in close districts, if they do not want to, to take any sides on this controversial question of conscription at the present time.

I am very glad to, because with me it is a fundamental American issue that transcends all party lines. I am opposed to conscription in peacetime unless it is found to be absolutely necessary, after exhausting every effort to secure volunteers. In such an event I would vote for conscription. I do not believe, however, that the conscription bill will come before the House for two, or possibly three weeks, or maybe more. It will be debated in the other body for two or three weeks. It will not be an issue before the House before that time and we will not have to go on record. In the meanwhile I am making my plea after considerable investigation to give the volunteer system a chance.

I submit that if the Congress—and after all it is our duty and no one else's, we have the power and the duty to legislate—if the Congress should reduce the term of enlistment in the Regular Army and the National Guard from 3 years to 1, at the same time increase the pay from $21 to $30 a month, I honestly and sincerely believe we would obtain 400,000 or more volunteers by the 1st of October.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Would the gentleman fix a time limit within which they should volunteer?

Mr. FISH. I certainly would. The gentleman has asked a very pertinent question, and it is the main question involved in the issue I am discussing. One of the columnists, Mr. Jay Franklin—whether that is his name is another matter, I think it is an alias—has this to say in the Star of August 3, under the heading of his column, We the people:

FISH and WHEELER oppose conscription, but suppose they are wrong again?

That is the heading. He refers primarily, I suppose, to our fight on the neutrality bill which, I want to point out to the House, with its cash-and-carry provision has done what most of us wanted, it has kept us out of foreign wars, and we are not ashamed of that fight. But he says suppose we are wrong? And what he is trying to argue is that unless we put through the conscription bill immediately we will endanger our national defense. That is not true, we are not asking for any delay but to try out the volunteer system. If we are attacked by some foreign foe—and I do not believe we will be for a long time—I would be willing to admit that we would be wrong if his premise were correct, but his premise is totally wrong. We are not in any way trying to prevent an identical increase in our Army or National Guard by October 1. We want to give the young manhood of America, whom we think as patriotic as they ever were, the opportunity to volunteer. During the World War approximately 1,000,000 volunteered, if I remember the figure correctly.

We want to give them the chance to volunteer and we want to ask the Congress to reduce the period of enlistment from 3 years to 1 and to increase the pay from $21 to $30 a month. When this is done we say we shall have no difficulty in securing 400,000 volunteers by the 1st of October. Failing that—I would like to see it written into law—failing that the so-called draft bill would go into effect and we could select 400,000 by conscription. I am making my argument on what I consider to be sound common sense and reason, we would have identically the same national defense, identically the same number of enlisted men that we would under the draft bill, and we would do it by the volunteer system. Failing to secure these volunteers I would vote for a partial conscription bill providing for 400,000 draftees the 1st of October, or the difference between the volunteers and that number.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman would write that into law?

Mr. FISH. Yes. I claim the War Department has filled even under the 3-year enlistments every quota it has asked for. The Eastern newspapers and interventionists have built up a myth by propaganda that the volunteer system has been tried and has failed.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. And if the gentleman found we could not get the proper quota by voluntary enlistment under his conditions he would be willing to support the conscription bill?

Mr. FISH. Yes. I would write that into law. I would, of course, certainly want to give them 30 days' time to enlist. Assuming the bill was passed in September, I would want to give them 30 days in which to volunteer.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman would write that into law?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I would write that into the law.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is the gentleman in favor of granting the President power to call out the National Guard and the Reserves at this time?

Mr. FISH. If the Regular Army General Staff informs Congress it is absolutely necessary—and they claim it is—in order to train these 400,000 volunteers which I am asking for, or 400,000 draftees if the draft becomes absolutely necessary for national defense, we should give it careful consideration. I must admit, however, that I think it is a terrific hardship on the members of the National Guard. I think it is an unfortunate position to put them in, because it means they will lose their jobs, and no matter how we legislate we cannot expect they will get them back. I admit to the gentleman, therefore, that if I were here when the bill comes up, and it probably will come up while I am away at camp, but if I were here I would vote for it most reluctantly, because I think it is a very unfair proposal.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. But the gentleman would vote for it?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does not the gentleman consider, and I know he does, that the National Guard and the Reserve officers are defense forces? They are our front-line force. If we vote to put them into the active service when they are the second-line defense force, how can we justify not raising the Regular Army to a sufficient number so that the National Guard can go back to its normal position?

Mr. FISH. I do not think we can, and should raise 400,000 volunteers. I think it is a shame that we have to call out the National Guard to train other troops. If they could call them out for 3 or 6 months at the most to train these 400,000 volunteers or draftees and get them started, that might be sufficient. I would like to see the National Guard bill amended so that they would only be called out to the 1st of April. That is when the next 400,000 men will be called under the pending draft bill. I do not understand why the Regular Army officers and the Reserve officers cannot train the newly enlisted men.

I do not want to discuss the National Guard bill. I would vote for it most reluctantly, although I think it is fundamentally unfair; but if we have to have it to train the volunteers in this emergency or the draftees, I suppose we have got to vote for that bill. I have no other alternative. The way to train these men is to have officers and noncommissioned officers who are already trained to do it. I suppose the Army General Staff is correct, but it is most unfortunate to have to call out the National Guard for 1 year.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not most unfair to call out the National Guard and Reserve officers, then not vote conscription to augment those forces?

Mr. FISH. But you do not have to do that, because we can get all the volunteers we need if my suggestions are enacted into law. I propose to vote for conscription if I have to do so, but I say you can get all the volunteers you want for a 1-year enlistment, and particularly if the pay is increased to $30 a month. You can get 400,000 in no time. If I am wrong, no harm is done. We have given the volunteer system a chance. If that fails, then I will vote for conscription with a good conscience.

Mr. Speaker, what I want to do is amend the conscription bill, possibly also amend the guard bill when it comes up, reducing the term of service from 3 years to 1 year and increasing the pay from $21 to $30 a month. We can then go to the youth of America and ask them to volunteer. I am absolutely sincere in my belief and conviction that we would get 400,000 by the 1st of October, or in a month's time. Then we would not need the conscript system and Congress would be spared imposing the Hitler or European military or war system upon America. Militarism, conscription, autocracy, and dictatorship are one and inseparable, and all are dangerous to free institutions and a menace to our American way of life. A new Congress will be elected in November, which will come back here in January. Under the pending draft bill 400,000 more are to be called on the 1st of April. The volunteer system having worked, let us assume, we have the 400,000. The new Congress, looking the facts in the face from the standpoint of national defense in January, can pass any legislation that is needed for the best interests of the country, whether it be the draft system or the volunteer system. Everybody in this House knows that the situation abroad will change within the next 6 months. No one can foresee what may happen. It may be total war or it may be total peace within the next 6 months. If you follow the program I propose and give the volunteer system a chance to work, we can then face the additional and new facts and world situation when we meet next January and in the meanwhile we will not have one less soldier in our armed forces.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Under the pending compulsory military service bill, men up to 65 years of age are included in the draft. Why should not your proposed volunteer system include men up to 65 years of age so that our colleagues, who are under 65 years of age and who favor compulsory military service, as well as Mr. Franklin and these other fellows who are in favor of compulsory military service, can be among the first contingent to enlist and serve in Uncle Sam's Army for $21 a month? Then, also, in view of the fact that the real danger to our country is from within, due to the threat of bankruptcy of the Federal Treasury, why should not your bill also provide for voluntary contributions to pay for the cost of national preparedness and fighting any future war, so that the multimillionaire war propagandists, war mongers, and war interventionists can practice what they preach and give their wealth to save the Nation? [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. May I say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that in the first place the Senate has already amended the bill and reduced the age limit from 65 to 31. That amendment has been accepted in the committee. Personally, I think 31 is too high. It might as well be reduced to 25, because, after all, if we are preparing to fight everyone who has served in any war knows that it is the youth that fights battles. We could get plenty of men between 21 and 25, but inasmuch as they have amended it and made it 31, that takes care of the situation.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman would not prohibit these warmonger fellows, like this man who calls himself Franklin and others like him, from having the golden opportunity of enlisting and serving Uncle Sam at $21 a month. The gentleman would not want to prohibit the multimillionaire war mongers, interventionists, and internationalists who say, "Help the Allies," and take sides in wars of foreign nations and establish compulsory military service in the United States, from having an opportunity of divesting themselves of their millions to help preserve America in view of the almost bankrupt condition of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. FISH. May I say that some of my rich friends in New York are going to wake up with a shudder one of these days? The people up in New York who advocate conscription are not the wage earners and are not the farmers. They are very largely the men of wealth and the interventionists, and if I have to vote for a conscription bill, and I do not think we will have to do that if we give the volunteer system a chance, but if it fails and I have to vote for a conscription bill, then I will also vote for conscription of wealth and industry in the United States. [Applause.] It is not the man or woman on the farm who is advocating conscription, it is not the wage earner, the American Federation of Labor, the church elements such as the Methodist Church, the Baptist Church, or the Catholic Church, or the Gold Star Mothers, or the National Legion of Mothers of America. It is the men of wealth and the militarists.

If we are going to have a draft system, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, it is going to be a draft system that will be equal for everybody and everything. We will draft the soldier and we will likewise conscript wealth and industry. That is what the American Legion asked for 20 years ago and it is time that the Congress of the United States acted favorably upon it in event of war. If we are to force peacetime conscription upon the American people, then we must also in all fairness conscript wealth and industry and take the profits out of war and peacetime preparedness. National Commander Raymond J. Kelly, of the American Legion, is also opposed to peacetime conscription except as a last resort.

Commander Kelly said at Indianapolis on August 1:

> We are not at war, although everything that is being done seems to be based on the theory that we are or that we will be any moment.

In place of conscription, the Legion commander proposed to call for a million volunteers for a year's training.

> I believe the response—

He said—

> would be tremendous.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. But when we register our men and conscript human beings to prepare them and send them to war to be cannon fodder, then we should register all of the wealth in the United States. When the first class is conscripted to do the fighting, the wealth of the first class who have registered their wealth should be conscripted to do the paying. We can be reasonable and give them a $50,000 exemption, but if these millionaire war propagandists, interventionists, and warmongers who want to conscript human beings oppose wealth conscription but favor life conscription, they should have all of their worldly wealth taken to pay for preparing for and fighting future wars. They then can be put on W. P. A. with a nice, new, shiny shovel with Uncle Sam's name on it. From the beginning of the world many men have placed worldly wealth above human life. When it is certain that wealth will be conscripted to pay when human life is being conscripted to fight, we will have very little war propaganda and very few war-minded people in the land.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I assume the gentleman would approve of increasing the pay of the men who volunteer their services from $21 a month to $30 a month, that the gentleman would also approve of allowing these men to take out Government war-risk insurance, that he would approve of allotments for their families while they are in the service, and also that we should make every effort not to have mortgages on their homes foreclosed.

Mr. FISH. The gentlewoman from Massachusetts is obviously a mind reader. I approve of everything she said. What she said was simply this, that we should treat the veterans at this time just the same as we treated the veterans back in 1917, paying them $30 a month and giving them a chance to deduct out of their pay for insurance purposes, and so forth. I do not understand why we should hesitate to increase the soldiers' pay from $21 to $30, particularly when we talk of conscripting them. When we talk of taking them out of their jobs and permitting other wage earners at the same time to make $5, $10, and $15 a day in the shipyards and in the munitions works, then we would not be overgenerous in increasing the pay of our soldiers $9 a month, or 30 cents a day.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I agree very heartily with the gentleman's statement that the burdens of war should rest upon all alike and that there should be equality in the administration of any military bill we pass but, in view of the fact that it is known that modern wars are fought largely with mechanized equipment and that a very small percentage of the troops who are engaged in any campaign are equipped with rifles as infantry, does not the gentleman believe that if we spread the number and increased the margin for selection not alone among youth from 21 to 31 years of age but among men from 21 to 45 or from 21 to 50 or 60, we would have a wider field from which to gather, and we could impose the burdens more uniformly and justly?

Mr. FISH. I am sorry to say to the gentleman that I disagree totally. I believe we may as well realize the fact that war is fought by youth and not by middle-aged or old men. The average age of the soldier in the last war was something like 22, and it will be so in any future war. I assume we are not arming only for the sake of arming, we are arming only for the purpose of defense, for the purpose of preparedness against war.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman mean to say that a man between 31 and 45 could not drive an armored car or sit in a tank and use a gun?

Mr. FISH. I am perfectly willing to say that if we need men of 31 and upward we will call for them when we need them, and every other nation has done the same thing. England right now is only beginning to call men of 31 and 32. No matter how desperate their situation is, it is a matter of record and it is a matter of sound common sense because young men will always have to do the actual fighting.

I say to the Members of this House, Republicans and Democrats alike, that this certainly is one issue that is not partisan, this question of conscription, and also the question of keeping out of war. These two questions are above and beyond all partisanship. They are great American issues. When we depart from the volunteer system into what I believe is an utterly undemocratic and un-American system of conscription, we ought to make haste very slowly and make it on nonpartisan lines.

Look at some of the nations in the war, South Africa, Canada, and Australia. They have not yet had the draft. Canada is talking about some temporary kind of draft under which they cannot send their men overseas. The British Dominions have not even had the draft yet, but here we are, not in war, and with nobody thinking of attacking us, considering bringing over this European monstrosity—this European conscript system that breeds war—to America and wiping out our volunteer system under which our free institutions and republican form of government has prospered and been preserved.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois and Mr. PATRICK rose.

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I am glad the gentleman is pointing out what to me is the crux of the whole matter, that we have a peace problem, not a war problem. If we expect to get into the war, then, of course, we would believe in conscription and drafting everybody. We hear from all authorities, however, that Hitler could not attack us in 18 months, our ships and munitions will not be ready in 18 months, and it seems that the whole thing will not be ready until 18 months have passed. Our purpose is to have an army large enough and strong enough so that we will not get into war at any time in the future. What good, then, is a conscripted army that is going to be free in a year? It seems to me very obvious that what we need is a peacetime standing army, and for that we should be ready to pay whatever is necessary in salary and other inducements.

Mr. FISH. I quite agree with the gentlewoman from Illinois that we should do everything we can to build up our Regular Army and the volunteer system.

That is the duty of the Congress of the United States, and if we give these young Americans the chance, I am absolutely convinced we will get the 400,000 asked for. Failing that, let us write it into a bill and provide for the draft.

I am making these remarks now because in the next 2 or 3 weeks this body will also be considering framing a proper military defense bill. It will be under discussion in the Senate next week, and there is one way out, the American way, based upon the volunteer system. I would not stand here and oppose conscription unless I was not absolutely convinced that conscription is the road to dictatorship, totalitarianism, and war, just the way it is and has been in Europe. It destroys all peace elements, it creates war psychology, it makes the people believe that war is natural, that war is inevitable, and why not now. It is the one thing in the world America should keep away from if we possibly can do so, and have adequate national defense. The lady from Illinois [Miss SUMNER] is correct. Whom are we to fight? Hitler is hesitating to go 20 miles across the channel, and we have a Navy, thanks to Congress, that is seven times greater than the German Navy, and anybody to attack us would have to have a navy three times as large as ours, and any military man would tell you that no nation could land 50,000 men, because of lack of transports, even if we had no navy. With an army of 800,000 or a million we could wipe out that 50,000 in no time, or long before the transports can go back for more. But because we are in the midst of war hysteria, of fear of war, and a "blitzkrieg" of propaganda throughout the United States, a conscription bill is being rushed in and is apt to be rushed through and placed upon the statute books for 5 years, which is the beginning of militarism and dictatorship and the end of democracy as we have known it in America.

To my mind the most dangerous single thing that can happen to America today is to follow in the footsteps of the European militarists and dictators by insisting on conscription in peacetime and creating a huge war machine that will devour our free institutions and, perhaps, even destroy our representative form of government and the Congress itself. A very much needed defense in America today is a defense against foreign propaganda and propaganda machines working overtime to involve us in war against the will of 95 percent of the American people. Without regard to partisanship, no matter who is President, give him this huge military and autocratic power, and what will happen? France went into the war, and now they say that their leaders had no legal right to declare war, and those leaders are being tried. Put conscription into effect in America, and leaving out, for sake of argument, personalities and without referring to President Roosevelt or the next man, a Republican, who may be elected in November, I submit a military-minded interventionist President who wants to involve us in war has under conscription and these huge armies at his command the power to do so and he will not even have to ask Congress to declare war, and if he does and we do not declare war, Members of Congress may be ousted at the point of a bayonet, which is exactly what has happened under military dictators many times before with respect to parliamentary bodies in European nations. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, in connection with the statement I made on the floor, to extend my remarks by including a letter of January 17, one of January 27 to the Military Affairs Committee, and one letter of July 25, from the Military Affairs Committee, and a short statement appearing in the New York World-Telegram dealing with the question I have discussed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House heretofore made, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] is entitled to recognition.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a radio program over the Columbia Broadcasting System's full network of August 2, 1940, in which I discussed the subject Safeguarding Democracy With Roosevelt.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the Buffalo Evening News of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

A FRATERNAL ORDER THAT STANDS FOURSQUARE FOR THE COMMON MAN

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, in a few days the grand aerie of the Fraternal Order of Eagles will meet in a very notable annual session at Chicago, and I deem it not improper that I should embrace this occasion to pay my humble tribute to this order and to cite its splendid record as an instrumentality of service.

I am proud to be a member of this order, and I regret that my duties here have prevented my acceptance of an invitation to address the grand aerie at its coming session. I am always happy to be invited to address the Eagles, whether it be my own aerie at Indianapolis, the State aerie, or the grand aerie, for if there is one place where I always feel at home it is in a meeting of the Fraternal Order of Eagles.

Our order does not boast the so-called aristocracy of the earth. You will not find in it any scions of the ultra rich, any millionaire play boys, any ornamental sprigs of the social "400," any glittering tinsel of the human variety, but you will find in it a world of as good, honest folks as ever graced God's footstool. There is, thanks to the Giver of all good things, another kind of aristocracy, unlike the kind of which I have spoken—an aristrocracy in which the precious spirit of camaraderie blooms and flowers; an aristocracy of goodness; an aristocracy of kindness; an aristocracy of helpfulness; an aristocracy of humaneness, which says, "We pass through the vale of tears only once and let us help others all we can while we are here." That is real aristocracy. That kind of aristocracy represents the highest of human values. It is the aristocracy of the human spirit. It is not the kind of aristocracy that ignores and isolates and spurns contact with the ordinary form and mold of man, but it is the aristocracy of comradeship, forever drawing God's children into its encircling folds.

At its table is always spread a feast of love, and whosoever will may come. That is the kind of aristocracy you will find in the Fraternal Order of Eagles. It has often occurred to me that the good samaritan, who helped the sorely injured wayfarer out of the ditch and comforted him and took him to a place where his wounds could be treated, and then left money for his care, gave the first demonstration of the splendid altruism which in these modern times is exemplified in its finest flower and fruition in the Fraternal Order of Eagles.

I was made of common clay and I have never got over it. All through my life there have been not infrequent occasions when those who live in the lap of luxury and bask in the meridian blaze of social glamor, wealth, and favoritism have looked at me askance and have made me feel the aloofness which they have forced upon me, but I never have been, and am not now, ashamed of my humble upbringing, for though my father and mother were working folks, whose lives were devoted to hard and unremitting physical toil, no better people ever lived on this earth. God bless their memory!

Holding the democratic philosophy of life that I do, I like to think that I just naturally fit into the picture of the Fraternal Order of Eagles. On the wall of my office in Washington is a motto which I have tried to live up to in a sort of stumbling way throughout the years. It reads as follows:

> We can do nothing better; we can do nothing finer; we can do nothing grander than to help our fellow mortals over the rough places of life.

It seems to me that motto might well have a place over the door of every Eagles' lodge in America, for helpfulness in the consecrated spirit of service to our fellow mortals is the very sum and essence of the Eagles' creed.

This eagerness to serve, this out-reaching and groping for opportunities to be helpful to those who need assistance in the battles of life has made the Fraternal Order of Eagles one of the greatest humanitarian orders in the world, if not the greatest. I have no criticism of the many fraternal orders that serve good purposes and help to make life more bearable, but there is something about the Fraternal Order of Eagles that is different and distinctive, something not to be found in any other order. Other orders promote friendly associations and foster fellowship, and provide sick and death payments, which are of immeasurable value to those who most need these benefits, but the Fraternal Order of Eagles goes farther than that. It reaches out and tries to help in solving the distressing and difficult problems of human relief, and its record in that direction stands out like a great rock of safety above a turbulent sea.

Let us take a look at its magnificent history. Because of the space limitation which I am compelled to observe today it must necessarily be a very brief and fleeting glimpse which will not even begin to reveal the complete lovely picture of the Eagles' record of service to humanity.

No longer ago than 1921 no State, no county, no city in America had anything to offer the worthy aged dependents except the poorhouse, over whose dark and forbidding portals were emblazoned the burning words of shame, "Only paupers are received here." The Fraternal Order of Eagles conceived the noble idea of making the evening of life serene and secure for our old people who are poor through no fault of their own, without requiring them to move from their homes and firesides which are so sacredly entwined in their memories and affections.

In August 1921 at the Newark Grand Aerie, the representatives of half a million Eagles pledged all the resources of our fraternity to the fulfillment of this great humanitarian conception; and three past grand worthy presidents—William J. Brennen, Michael O. Burns, and Frank E. Hering—wrote the first old-age pension bill that became a law and withstood the tests of the courts. Today 48 States—all of the States in the Union—are paying pensions to the aged poor.

The Fraternal Order of Eagles wrote on the statute books of the State of Missouri the first mothers' pension law under the leadership of Edward Everett Porterfield of Kansas City, a great Eagle. Today practically all of the 48 States are giving aid to widowed mothers who have no other means of support. What a blessing that has been to many a mother whose heart ached under her crushing load of poverty and responsibility for her children, and what a blessing it will be to many a mother in the long years to come. The Fraternal Order of Eagles originated workmen's compensation and sponsored a militant campaign in all of the States to protect workers against industrial accidents which in the preceding years had blighted many a life and ruined many a home. Since the first workmen's compensation law was written by an Eagle, the late Mayor Daniel W. Hoan of Milwaukee, the Eagles' campaign to protect the workingmen of our country has proceeded so successfully that today 47 States are protecting the toilers from the hazards of their jobs.

On December 1, 1930, I first introduced in the Congress of the United States the Eagles' stabilization of employment bill, another noble conception of our order which embraces what many economists think is a perfect mechanism to iron out the humps and depressions of our industrial maladjustments to the end that steady employment may be furnished to our millions of workers at a saving wage. I have reintroduced the bill in every Congress since, and it has grown greatly in national favor the better it is understood. After a masterful presentation of its merits by Past Grand Worthy President Frank E. Hering, the congressional subcommittee to which it was referred reported it unanimously and enthusiastically with a favorable recommendation. While it has never reached the stage of final enactment, we have seen some of its vital provisions copied and paraphrased in New Deal legislation, which is a glowing testimonial of its worth.

It has been a subject of discussion among economists, not only of America, but of the entire world, for it embodies a principle of world-wide interest. I am more convinced than ever that what the country needs is the identical, original Eagles' stabilization bill. If I am reelected, I shall reintroduce it on the opening day of the next Congress, and if God gives me health and strength I shall never cease to battle for it. [Applause.]

I have spoken of a few of the major achievements of our order, but my meed of praise would be incomplete if I did not make reference to the attention which the Fraternal Order of Eagles always pays to the fine and sentimental things of life, and at the head of that catalogue of its interests and attentions I would place its sponsorship of Mother's Day. It is characteristic of this great order that in its busy efforts to make the world a better place for men and women to live in it should pause reverently to give to mother the niche that belongs to her. All of us love our mothers if they are living, and if they have passed from the earth to Heaven, as my mother has, our hearts reach across the mystic barriers of terrestrial space to tell them that we still love them.

In sponsoring a day annually when our thoughts and affections will center on our mothers and what we owe to them, the Fraternal Order of Eagles struck a chord that touches every human heart.

I wish I had more time to pay adequate tribute to the social and humanitarian achievements of the Fraternal Order of Eagles based on the immutable record, but it is sufficient to say that it has a program that is as broad as humanity itself; a program that not only applies to present conditions but that is elastic enough for expansion to meet future human needs as those needs develop. I could not close this part of my speech more appropriately, I think, than by citing the tribute paid to our order by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, one of our fellow Eagles. I quote the President:

> I have long observed with satisfaction the sponsorship by the F. O. E. of social-justice legislation, both in the States and in the Nation. The records for more than a quarter of a century bear witness to the campaigns of education conducted, the literature distributed, and the addresses delivered by your socially minded order. These efforts have borne, and are bearing, gratifying results. Our countrymen owe the Eagles good will for their unselfish services.

The President's tribute to our beloved order is well merited, for it is based on truth and justice.

The Fraternal Order of Eagles is one of the most democratic of all of our institutions. It can be said of it, more than of any other organization I know of, that its beneficent activities reach out to the flotsam and the jetsam. There are none too poor and humble to be touched by its uplifting hand. It recognizes the eternal truth that a hickory shirt or a calico dress may cover a heart as pure and true as any that beats beneath purple and fine linen; that virtue dwells as often in humble cottages and byways as in palaces. Times and conditions change and in the eternal sweep of years social trends take on many varied and fleeting forms, but the helping hand of the Fraternal Order of Eagles will always be needed in this world and my prayer is that it will go on and on, doing good forever. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington, who is a very eminent member of the Order of Eagles.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I rise to compliment the distinguished gentleman from Indiana on the interesting and eloquent tribute that he has paid to the Fraternal Order of Eagles, which is undoubtedly the greatest humanitarian organization in the United States, and probably in the world. The distinguished gentleman from Indiana referred a few moments ago to President Roosevelt and his membership in our fraternity. President Roosevelt is a life member of the Buffalo, N. Y., Aerie, and has participated very actively in the affairs of Eagledom for many years in New York State. It has been my privilege, as the gentleman indicated, to belong to our fraternity for many years. I have been a member of the Hoquiam, Wash., Aerie for approximately 25 years and served some years ago on the Washington Eagles state committee on old-age pensions. The order now has a membership of 600,000, and I know that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana will agree with me when I say that there probably is no greater force for social progress, for righteousness, for Americanism, and for true patriotism in our country than the Fraternal Order of Eagles. There is no organization which can point to such a record of constructive achievement, as our colleague has outlined, and I compliment the gentleman also on his sponsorship of the Ludlow Eagle stabilization employment bill, H. R. 4. I have often conferred with the gentleman in regard to it, and I believe the time is coming very soon, and becoming most propitious, when we will be able to obtain favorable action on the bill before Congress. It provides a formula to balance production with consumption in industry and agriculture; encourage capital; and provides a solution for the problem of unemployment in this country; and give labor steady jobs at a saving wage.

Mr. LUDLOW. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. HARTER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to yield to my friend from Ohio, who is also a very distinguished member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles.

Mr. HARTER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the distinguished gentleman from Indiana upon the fine and deserved tribute he has paid to one of the truly great fraternal organizations of this country. There is little one could add to his eulogy of this outstanding humanitarian fraternity. Those of us who have been members of the Fraternal Order of Eagles for many years past are familiar with its objectives, its principles, and its many acts of charity and human kindness in the hundreds of communities in the United States where it has local aeries. The order has led the fight for adequate old-age pensions and has been instrumental in securing the enactment of beneficial social legislation in many of the States of the Union. This order is a continuing influence for human rights and human progress in all of the localities where it is established.

I have taken this occasion, Mr. Speaker, in these few words to praise the efforts of the gentleman from Indiana and to add my brief tribute to this great body of patriotic Americans, the Fraternal Order of Eagles.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his splendid tribute.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York, who also is an outstanding member of our order.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise to add my words of praise to the remarks the gentleman has made today. It so happens that I have been a member of the Eagles for a number of years. I cannot place the words in the splendid manner the gentleman from Indiana has, but I commend everything that he has said.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes. The Fraternal Order of Eagles is very strong in the State of Minnesota, and the distinguished gentleman who is addressing me is one of the very best friends of the order.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In my district in Minnesota we have an Eagles lodge which has 3,200 members at the present time, which speaks pretty well for the standing of that organization in that particular section. In my experience over the years of my life I have joined most of the fraternal organizations at one time or another and held office in them. I have never seen any organization which excels the Eagles in the work which they are doing, the ideals which they express at their meetings, and in the general caliber of the things for which they stand.

Mr. LUDLOW. I thank the gentleman for that kind tribute. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

MARJORIE PARK, DAVIS ISLAND, TAMPA, FLA.

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4106) to authorize the construction of certain facilities in Marjorie Park, Davis Island, Tampa, Fla., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand this bill passed the House——

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. A similar bill.

Mr. MICHENER. A similar bill passed the House?

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. And went to the Senate and then the Senate passed a similar bill?

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. That is correct.

Mr. MICHENER. But the Senate did not substitute the House bill for the Senate bill; and the purpose of this action is to pass the Senate bill in the House, or substitute the Senate bill for the House bill?

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. That is right.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand that at the time the Senate passed its bill the House bill, which had passed the House, was then pending in the Senate?

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Yes; the House bill had passed the House and was pending in the Senate, but inadvertently they passed the Senate bill and did not substitute the House bill.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Are you sure it was an inadvertence, or that the real reason was that a Senator wanted to get credit for the passage of his own bill?

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. I do not know the reason. I presume it was an inadvertence; but, anyway, the Senate bill was passed.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In view of the gentleman's interest in the bill and to protect the integrity of the House, I shall not at this time object to that kind of maneuvering in the Senate, in order that the gentleman from Florida can pass the legislation which he sponsored and had the House pass. The RECORD indicates that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PETERSON] should receive the credit for the enactment of this legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal Works Administrator be and he is hereby, authorized to accept on behalf of the United States of America, without cost, title to a tract of land in Marjorie Park, Davis Island, Tampa, Fla., suitable for use for the site of a United States quarantine station.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $76,000 to be expended by the Federal Works Administrator for the construction and installation of such buildings, utilities, and appurtenances thereto on the tract of land herein authorized to be acquired to replace the existing United States quarantine station adjoining MacDill Field, Fla.

SEC. 3. Upon completion of the construction above authorized, the Federal Works Administrator is hereby authorized and directed to transfer to the control and jurisdiction of the Secretary of War as an addition to MacDill Field, Fla., or for use for other military purposes, the land and improvements now comprising the United States quarantine station adjoining MacDill Field, Fla.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert a letter from some constituents regarding conscription and other national problems.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a short article from a Washington paper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 7, 1940

(Legislative day of Monday, August 5, 1940)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Rev. Duncan Fraser, assistant rector, Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who art the Father of all men upon the earth: Most heartily we pray that Thou wilt deliver Thy children from cruelties of war, and lead the nations into the way of a just peace. Help us to put away all bitterness and misunderstanding, that we and all the brethren of the Son of Man may draw together as one comity of peoples, and dwell ever more in the fellowship of that Prince of Peace, who liveth and reigneth with Thee in the unity of the Holy Spirit, world without end. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day of Tuesday, August 6, 1940, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 571) to authorize the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice to conduct investigations in the interests of national defense, and for that purpose to permit wire tapping in certain cases, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House having proceeded to reconsider the bill (H. R. 3233) to repeal certain acts of Congress (pocket-vetoed), returned by the President of the United States with his objections, to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, it was—

Resolved, That the said bill do not pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives not agreeing to pass the same.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 4106) to authorize the construction of certain facilities in Marjorie Park, Davis Island, Tampa, Fla., and for other purposes, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

ACTIVE DUTY FOR RETIRED OFFICERS OF COAST GUARD

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to order retired commissioned and warrant officers of the Coast Guard to active duty during time of national emergency, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate 10 letters from the Archivist of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, lists of papers and documents on the files of the Departments of the Navy, the Interior, Commerce (2), and Labor (2); Federal Security Agency, Social Security Board; and Federal Works Agency, Public Buildings Administration, and Work Projects Administration (2), which are not needed in the conduct of business and have no permanent value or historical interest, and requesting action looking to their disposition, which, with the accompanying papers, were referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Papers in the Executive Departments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. TOBEY members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the petition of Father Divine and sundry other citizens of the United States, praying that the Americas be united for peace, and also praying for the enactment of pending legislation to prevent and punish the crime of lynching, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Ed Henrickson, on behalf of the membership of the National Maritime Union, Chicago (Ill.) Branch, remonstrating against the enactment of compulsory military-training legislation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a memorial from sundry citizens of San Francisco, Calif., remonstrating against the enactment of compulsory military-training legislation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Christian Citizenship Conference held under the auspices of the National Reform Association at Winona Lake, Ind., favoring setting aside a day for prayer and repentance for the Nation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS ON DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

Mr. BARKLEY, from the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Executive Papers, to which were referred, for examination and recommendation, nine lists of records transmitted to the Senate by the Archivist of the United States, which appeared to have no permanent value or historical interest, submitted reports thereon pursuant to law.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on August 6, 1940, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 3998) to increase the credit resources of Commodity Credit Corporation.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CLARK of Idaho:

S. 4249. A bill for the relief of the widows of the late George A. Meffan and John Glenn; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. REYNOLDS:

S. 4250. A bill conferring jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the Western District of North Carolina to hear, determine, and render judgments upon the claims against the United States of I. M. Cook, J. J. Allen, and the Radiator Specialty Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NYE:

S. 4251. A bill for the relief of Rudolph Mundt; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BRIDGES:

S. J. Res. 289. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to terms of the President of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 571) to authorize the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice to conduct investigations in the interests of national defense, and for that purpose to permit wire tapping in certain cases, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

SELECTIVE COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING AND SERVICE—AMENDMENTS

Mr. DOWNEY and Mr. GURNEY each submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (S. 4164) to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

STATEMENTS BY GRENVILLE CLARK AND JULIUS OCHS ADLER

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD statements by Mr. Grenville Clark and Col. Julius Ochs Adler in reply to certain allegations made to the Senate on yesterday by the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT].

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of August 7, 1940]

BACKERS OF COMPULSORY SELECTIVE SERVICE REPLY TO ATTACKS MADE BY SENATOR HOLT

DUBLIN, N. H., August 6.—Grenville Clark, chairman of the National Emergency Committee of the Military Training Camps Association of the United States, issued the following statement tonight:

"The personal attacks by Senator HOLT in the Senate today on members of the Military Training Camps Association who sponsored the original selective-service bill are to be expected in view of the source from which they come. The integrity and character of those concerned rests on many years of private and public life in their communities.

"The origin of the pending bill, the names of those who worked on it, and their reasons for so doing were openly and fully stated at the first session of the hearings in the Senate Military Affairs Committee. This body of men has no need to meet irresponsible and false charges, but can stand on their records and the patriotic character of their motives.

"I myself have felt fairly honored that this group of men which includes two holders of the Congressional Medal of Honor and five holders of the Distinguished Service Cross invited me to be their chairman.

"Every demagogic effort, every device of false rumor and misstatement, every intrigue of the agents of Hitler, may now be expected to try to defeat this bill. But it will pass, because the time has come for all Americans to stand up and be counted and to decide whether America is to follow the judgment of Roosevelt and Pershing and Stimson and Marshall, or of Senator HOLT and his like."

STATEMENT BY COLONEL ADLER

Col. Julius Ochs Adler, civilian aide to the Secretary of War, made the following reply last night to Senator HOLT'S attack:

"Senator HOLT'S statement concerning those present at the Harvard Club meeting favoring compulsory military service, embodied in the Burke-Wadsworth bill, contained nothing that was not publicly known. There was a meeting of the Second Corps Area Military Training Camps held at the Harvard Club on May 22, and the list of those present, as well as the resolutions adopted, were given to the press and published in the New York Times and other newspapers, and were carried by the press associations.

"The Military Training Camps Association is recognized by the War Department. The governing body consists of 9 civilian aides to the Secretary of War and 48 civilian State aides of the Secretary of War. It represents thousands of World War officers who were trained at Plattsburg and similar camps.

"Almost the first words of the constitution of the association state that the association believes in universal military conscription as the proper means for defense of the Nation. This has been in its constitution since the association was founded in 1920. As corps-area head for the second Corps Area, I naturally was present at the meeting, held under the auspices of the Second Corps Area.

"With respect to charges made that I favored the bill for selective service in order to protect my foreign investments in countries now at war, I have this to say:

"I have no investments of any kind whatsoever in any corporation other than The New York Times Co. and The Times Printing Co., the latter publishing The Chattanooga Times, in Tennessee, and in Government bonds.

"As I have publicly stated heretofore, having served as an officer overseas during the World War and having continued as a Reserve officer since that time to date, I believe that the only way adequately to prepare this country for defense is a selective-service bill that will permit a sufficient number of men to be trained before a war emergency arises. The volunteer system, throughout the entire history of this Nation, has never worked.

"If these views are unpatriotic, then Senator HOLT must similarly find fault with Gen. George Marshall, Chief of Staff of the Army; General Pershing; President Conant, of Harvard University; President Dodds, of Princeton, and many other distinguished and competent soldiers and citizens who hold similar views."

EXPROPRIATION OF PRIVATE MANUFACTURING PLANTS

Mr. DANAHER obtained the floor.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a short but very important and interesting editorial which appeared in yesterday's Newark Evening News.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

ONE WOMAN'S ALERTNESS

Old Demosthenes voiced the idea first in an attack upon the menace to Greece of Philip of Macedon, and thence through the ages has developed a conviction that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. That conviction has just found a new exemplar in a Verona housewife, Mrs. S. B. Cruden, of 42 Oakridge Road. She could scarcely believe her eyes in reading in the National Defense Act of last June that the Congress had bestowed on the Secretary of the Navy, with the President's approval, the right in peacetime to take over private manufacturing plants in the interest of defense, and to fix compensation therefor. Did the Congress know what it had done? She sat herself down and wrote to Representative KEAN, of the twelfth district, to find out, and thereby started something.

This power to take over private industry had been in the bill at the beginning, but had been stricken out by both House and Senate. Then in conference it had been slipped in again without authority by some friend of the administration. All unwittingly, without access to printed copies of the conference report, both Houses passed the compromise bill and the President signed it. Mrs. Cruden's letter to Representative KEAN was on July 28, and 3 days later the House voted repeal of the "joker." Senator BARBOUR will engineer the plan for its repeal in the Senate.

This episode is a refreshing instance of democracy at work in a dictator-ridden world. Only a free press could have conveyed to Mrs. Cruden the knowledge of what her Government was about. And only where freedom of speech is guaranteed would an individual voter dare to question it.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I am not going to encroach too greatly on the time of my learned and generous friend from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], because of the unanimous-consent agreement now in force which limits his time to hold the floor, but I desire to point out that the broad, far-reaching power to take over private manufacturing plants referred to in the editorial just read was first suggested to the Congress and the country in a communication by the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Edison. Later on he said, both in speeches, and, I think in statements which he sent either to the committee or to the Congress, that he thought this particular grant of power to the President was a mistake, and I, as a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, thought the episode was closed. It was not until just recently that I heard, from one of my colleagues in the House of Representatives and others, that it was not a closed episode at all but was a very live one; that, as a matter of fact, these broad powers which were not in either the Senate bill or the House bill were somehow included in the final bill as signed by the President.

The action which the House has taken is recited in the editorial which has been read, and I feel that the Senate must of course be of exactly the same mind as is the House. I have had this editorial read so that the Senate may know what happened, and so that nothing may be done to prevent the repeal of this mysterious provision referred to, which certainly I myself felt would in no way be associated with the naval development program, which, as a matter of fact, I was confident was not in the bill when it passed the Senate, and which I am advised by most competent authority was not in the bill that passed the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. DANAHER. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to make a comment on the editorial which the Senator has had read and has been talking about.

I know nothing about the matter except what I have heard of the editorial which has just been read by the clerk; but, on the face of the editorial, it seems to me that there is probably an error. If the editorial is correct, then the particular bill—I do not even know what it is—went through a conference committee which put into the bill something that was not in the House bill and was not in the Senate bill.

That is a violation of the rules of both the Senate and the House, and if the statement in the editorial is correct the conference report would have been subject to a point of order in either House. So it appears, if that is what happened, that everybody in both the Senate and the House has permitted something to be done in a conference report which is a violation of the rules of both the House and the Senate.

If the Senator will investigate, I think he will find that the editorial is wrong. It does not seem to me possible that that kind of a thing could happen. When it is claimed that it is necessary to go to a newspaper to get the facts of a matter of this kind, it seems to me we ought to know certainly that the newspaper is stating the matter accurately, and that the newspaper itself has not, unintentionally perhaps, related something that actually did not happen when it says that it did.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will yield to me for a moment further, I am, of course, not surprised at the astonishment expressed by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska. I was as much surprised as he was when I first heard about this strange episode.

The facts in the case are—and this can be easily verified by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska or anyone else—that the House itself has already taken action to correct this action on the part of the conferees or someone else following the passage of the bill by both Houses. That fact is also mentioned in the editorial. It was, as a matter of fact, that action on the part of the House which awakened my interest and surprise. The House has taken action, and took it on the very premises and because of the very reasons given in the editorial. That is the reason why I am saying now that the Senate must be on its guard and on notice not to become a part of whatever it was that was done, but instead to correct the error which has been made. Certainly, as far as my knowledge is concerned, as I have said before, this proposition was certainly not voted in the bill in either the Naval Affairs Committee or the Senate when the bill came to the floor.

I remember the first instance perfectly clearly. I remember Mr. Edison's statement on the subject. I remember his later saying that this suggestion or proposal was a mistake—"a mistake," I am quite sure, were his own words. I think, too, that he said when he came before our committee—but I am not absolutely sure about this—that his thoughts in this particular connection had been misinterpreted, or something of that kind; but, anyway, there is no doubt whatever in my mind that no such powers as originally suggested by the Secretary of the Navy to be given to the President in peacetime over the acquisition of private plants and many other things were included in any bill, either here or in the House. The House had exactly the same feelings, because it has taken action on the subject to correct the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. What has the House done?

Mr. BARBOUR. I think the House has entered a repealer.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the repealer?

Mr. BARBOUR. It is to repeal that part of the act which was added apparently in conference, as I understand.

Mr. NORRIS. It is a new bill to repeal a law?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; I should not think so. I know, however, the House has taken appropriate action, and exactly what this action is can be easily ascertained.

Mr. NORRIS. That action does not mean that the conferees absolutely violated the rules of both Houses, but it means that someone has introduced a bill which repeals a provision that is now law. It may be all right. I do not know.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] any longer. I am trying to make clear that in my considered judgment that provision was put in the bill somehow, at some time, and, I presume, by some conferee, without authority of either House. I saw in the newspaper a statement made by one of the Representatives who was a conferee to the effect that he was amazed when he learned later that that provision was in the bill when it went to the President for signature.

I am making no accusations, but I am merely endeavoring, vigorously, promptly, and at once, to put the Senate on notice. I am going to find out more about just what corrective action has been taken by the House. I trust the Senator from Nebraska, who has shown characteristic interest in the matter, will do the same thing. I feel that something was done which should not have been done, and which has now been detected.

Mr. NORRIS. If the editorial is correct, that certainly is true.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. I should like to contribute what I have found in the proceedings of the House of Representatives upon this subject.

A Representative from Illinois, Mr. CHURCH, on July 31, speaking on the floor of the House in connection with the repealer, stated what had occurred and then asked the question, "How did it happen?" And then he proceeds to answer:

The bill as reported by our committee—

That is, the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House—did not contain such language.

That was the language authorizing the Secretary of the Navy and the President to commandeer industries if they saw fit.

It did not confer such powers on the Secretary of the Navy and the President. If you examine H. R. 9822, as reported to the House and subsequently passed by the House, you will not discover any such terms as is now embodied in section 8 (b) of the act of June 28.

The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs amended that section. But if you examine the bill as reported by the Senate committee and as passed by the Senate, you will not find the language in question.

Obviously these far-reaching terms were inserted while the bill was in conference. The record shows that on June 21 the Senate asked for a conference. On June 22 the House and Senate agreed to a conference; and, Mr. Chairman, on the same day the conference committee made its report to the House and Senate. On the same day the House and Senate agreed to the conference report.

The conference committee report was not printed. When the House agreed to the report it relied on the explanation made by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. But nowhere in his explanation of the report will be found any mention of this very important provision inserted in the bill. I am confident he did not realize the potentialities of this new matter in the report. Somehow, by some means, in the haste of the conference committee to bring the bill back to the House and the Senate, the Navy Department advisers had the words put in the bill.

When my Committee on Naval Affairs met today I insisted upon an executive session so that I might bring this matter to the attention of the committee for the first time. That any such language was embodied in the bill as finally enacted was news to the committee. Our committee would never accept any such provision.

And let me add, Mr. President, that nowhere in this colloquy in the House was there any dispute concerning the allegations of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President——

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BARBOUR. I appreciate very much the valuable contribution just made by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota.

In answer to the question which the distinguished Senator from Nebraska was good enough to ask me as to what the House has done to correct the situation in which we now find ourselves, I am glad to be able to now read from the record that in House bill 10263, making supplementary appropriations for the national defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and other purposes, on page 26, line 15, appears the following:

The first proviso in section 8 (b) of the act approved June 28, 1940 (Public, No. 671), is hereby repealed.

SELECTIVE SERVICE COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I received this morning a brief telegram from a distinguished clergyman of the Middle West, with the request that the information it contains be transmitted to Congress. I ask that it be read at the desk. It will take but a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the telegram will be read.

The legislative clerk read the telegram, as follows:

DUBUQUE, IOWA, August 6, 1940.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Catholic bishops of my province and overwhelming majority of Catholic people in Midwest are vigorously opposed to compulsory peacetime draft legislation. Urge as a substitute that voluntary system be intensified and given thorough trial. Please transmit these views to your colleagues in the Senate and House of Representatives.

FRANCIS J. BECKMAN,
Archbishop of Dubuque.

ACTIVE SERVICE OF NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVE, AND RETIRED PERSONNEL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, after line 17, it is proposed to add a new subsection, to read:

(f) Any person now subject to the provisions of section 1 may resign his status within 20 days after the approval of this joint resolution.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I have offered as an amendment, which is now the pending business, the proposal that we add a new subsection to be known as subsection (f), on page 4 of the joint resolution, the amendment reading as follows:

Any person now subject to the provisions of section 1 may resign his status within 20 days after the approval of this joint resolution.

It would seem that in the light of the discussion to which we have just listened there well might be more considered attention given to some of the objectives sought by the legislation evoked by the national-defense program of which the pending joint resolution is a part. Section 1 of the joint resolution definitely provides that the President is hereby authorized, not to call into service, not to train, but "to order into the active military service of the United States for a period of 12 consecutive months any or all members and units of any or all reserve components of the Army of the United States, and retired personnel of the Regular Army, with or without their consent."

Mr. President, the situation which confronts us when we consider that language necessarily takes us back to an examination of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended. Reading from the monograph prepared for the use of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, at page 118, in section 111, we find these words:

When Congress shall have declared a national emergency and shall have authorized the use of armed land forces of the United States for any purpose requiring the use of troops in excess of those of the Regular Army, the President may * * * order into the active military service of the United States, to serve therein for the period of the war or emergency * * * any or all units and members of the National Guard of the United States.

Mr. President, the measure before us has commonly been referred to, both on the floor and in the public prints, as a joint resolution to call out the National Guard. The distinguished senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, yesterday pointed out, in response to my question, as appears in the RECORD at page 9927, that the components referred to are the National Guard of the United States, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Organized Reserves, and the Enlisted Reserve Corps.

Hundreds of thousands of men are affected by this measure. They may be ordered out for service at any point in the Western Hemisphere, from Iceland and Greenland, or the Aleutian Islands in Alaska, all the way to the tip of South America. They can be sent, and doubtless will be sent, to any of the territories and insular possessions of the United States.

Mr. President, there is no provision in the joint resolution for what is to happen to the economic welfare of 116,000 members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, merely to take one unit. Contemplate, if you will, some young professional man and an acquaintance of mine as to whom the facts are appropriate may serve for purposes of illustration, who for 15 years has annually undertaken the training required for the Officers' Reserve Corps. Late in life, comparatively speaking, he married. He bought a home. He mortgaged the home under the Federal Housing Administration plan, which was the only way in which he could acquire a home. That plan requires that he amortize the payments of interest and principal monthly. Of course, there are included payments for taxes and insurance, in addition.

Mr. President, that young man has been spending the intervening years in developing a law practice, dependent solely upon his personal efforts for its success. If he is called out and ordered to some point on the bleak coast of Greenland, there to render active military service in the Army of the United States, in defense of the Western Hemisphere, he will have a year to think over exactly what sacrifice he is making and exactly what the Congress is failing even to consider as to the plight of himself and his family. Of course the case of this young professional man can be multiplied by thousands. The plight of yet others in the National Guard may equally be worthy of consideration.

Mr. President, those who are members of these component reserves willingly, and gladly, and voluntarily assumed their respective roles in the respective services referred to, but they did it at a time when they knew as a matter of law that they were not to be ordered into the active military service of the United States unless the Congress "shall have declared a national emergency and shall have authorized the use of armed land forces of the United States" throughout the period of the emergency.

The inequity of ordering these men into service without giving them an opportunity to protect themselves, and their status and the status of their families becomes apparent with the mere statement and outline and exposition of the situation. We find that the committee has undertaken, on page 3 of the joint resolution, to require that under certain circumstances some employees, members of the forces called into service, are to be rehired at the end of the year of service. We find in subsection (A) of section 3 that if the employee was engaged in the service of the United States he shall be restored to his position, or to a like position of like status. We find, however, yet another classification referred to, that if the person was in the employ of a private employer, "such employer shall restore such person to such position, or to a position of like status and pay, unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I have read the language referring to a private employer, and I should like to have the Senator's opinion in regard to it. Does the Senator think that that would have any legal effect? Why is it in the joint resolution?

Mr. DANAHER. In answer to the Senator from Nebraska, I think that the language constitutes a delusion and a snare, that it will lead men to think that if they left their private employment the Congress would have the power and would take steps to protect them; and I deny that the Congress has any such power.

Mr. NORRIS. That seems perfectly apparent to me. I did not realize, however, until the Senator so forcefully called our attention to it, that it might mislead someone. I thought it was really harmless. But I can see, as the Senator has stated, that it might mislead some who may have the idea that Congress has jurisdiction in that kind of a case.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me thank the Senator from Nebraska, and proceed to point out that there has not been developed on the floor of the Senate the thought which underlies these particular paragraphs.

Last night a vote was called for on the committee amendment, and without objection the vote was taken, and there was no reason why it should not have been taken; but when the joint resolution was being explained by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs a few days ago, I asked about this matter, for he undertook, in the course of his explanation, to interpolate in the language the words "in interstate commerce," from which those of us who were listening to him might have drawn the conclusion that it was claimed that the Congress had power to order some private employer somewhere to restore, under a contractual status, an employee who was ordered into the military service, on the theory that the employer was engaged in interstate commerce.

When I called to the attention of the Senator from Texas the fact that that language was not in the joint resolution, the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] undertook to explain to us that it had been omitted in the committee; that the Senator from Texas inadvertently had interpolated the language; that actually the committee apparently was proceeding on the theory that the Congress had the authority so to legislate, on the ground that since the Congress, under the Constitution, has power over the raising of armies, it also has power to follow collateral and derivative exigencies, apparently, in all phases of the employment of the personnel of the Army.

I asked whether the Senators who had expressed the opposing views had reconciled their views, and, so far as I know, they have done so, in that the language still stands, and the words "interstate commerce" have not been restored to the joint resolution.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Let me say to the Senator that the measure, as it was first formed, contained the words "in interstate commerce," and I do not recall when I made my opening address on the joint resolution that later those words were omitted by the committee and that the form now referred to by the Senator from Connecticut was adopted by the committee.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the Senator from Texas a question while he is on his feet. The measure in the form in which it now is on our desks, omitting that language, proceeds on the theory, does it not, that the Congress may legislate with reference to future employment and the restoration of employees to their employment on the theory that the Congress has power under the Constitution to control the raising of armies and all collateral incidents?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is my understanding.

Mr. DANAHER. And that is the basis, is it not, on which this measure now proceeds?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is on that basis on which it proceeds in connection with this particular provision.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, it is perfectly apparent, even if we grant that Congress has such power, that it does not apply to the individual businessman; it does not apply to the professional man; it certainly does not apply to the man who has no employment at the present time and who would be denied the opportunity to seek to restore himself with reference to it.

But, Mr. President, in order further apparently to lead people to think that Congress has that power to protect them, on page 4 of the measure we undertake to say that an employer who refuses to restore such an employee to his previous employment is guilty of an unfair labor practice within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act, a matter which I took up with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] in brief conference, pointing out that in my humble opinion that actually is a definite diversion of the whole purpose of the National Labor Relations Act, which may lead to incalculable harm in that particular.

In any event, if the employer shall not restore the employee, the Congress now says that a district court shall order a speedy hearing on motion of an employee who is not taken back in his employment, and shall advance the case on the calendar, as though we have any power to control the orderly disposition of the judicial process, and to say in what order a court shall determine the cases before it.

Moreover, Mr. President, we undertake to confer jurisdiction on the Federal court, upon the filing of a motion, a petition, or other appropriate pleading by the person entitled to the benefits of the provisions, specifically to require the employer to comply with such provisions.

Mr. President, I submit that the first test of any such attempted conferring of jurisdiction will meet with complete denial by the courts of any such jurisdiction.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator contend that Congress cannot regulate the jurisdiction of inferior courts?

Mr. DANAHER. I mean to say that the Congress of the United States, under the provisions of the pending joint resolution, has no power whatever to prescribe the order in which a court shall hear petitions.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know, but a minute ago the Senator was contending, as I understood him, that Congress could not regulate the jurisdiction of inferior courts.

Mr. DANAHER. I am not covering the whole wide field of jurisprudence. I am talking about the pending joint resolution, and talking about the language which I think fails of its purpose.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know whether or not the language is sufficient, but Congress certainly has the power to confer on courts under its jurisdiction the power to hear these cases. If the language is not in proper form, I am sure the Senator from Connecticut can draft proper language and will be prepared to submit it to the committee. But under the authority given Congress to create inferior courts, Congress has the power to regulate and control, or entirely abolish their jurisdiction if it sees fit to do so.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the Senator from Texas if he claims that the Congress has the right to prescribe the order in which any court on which it confers jurisdiction shall hear cases?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas did not say that.

Mr. DANAHER. Well, does the Senator say it now?

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, Congress may not undertake to say how a court shall decide a case, but under the provision of the Constitution the Congress has the power to say that certain cases shall be advanced, as we have done in many instances, and shall have a preferential status for hearing. Congress may not tell a court how to decide a case, but the Congress has the power to say that the district court shall give preferential consideration to certain character of cases under its broad powers. Yes; I say that.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am in complete sympathy with the amendment which the Senator from Connecticut has offered. However, I am completely out of harmony with what the Senator is saying in regard to the matter contained in section 3, the amendment, which has to do with an attempt on the part of Congress to protect the interests of those men who are ordered into service, especially those who are ordered into service for 1 year's training. I am sure the Senator from Connecticut does not wish to leave the impression that the Congress of the United States should not take any action, or possibly cannot, within the law, to see that the men who are ordered to this training are restored to their proper places in industry. I am sure the Senator from Connecticut does not wish to leave such an impression.

Mr. DANAHER. The Senator from Utah correctly understands my attitude in that respect.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The problem of how to do it, of course, faced the committee. We know that the President's war powers are great. We know also, from various decisions, that the war powers of the President and of the Congress are great. We have assumed that those powers can be extended to peacetime training. We do not have much to support us, so far as decisions are concerned, because I think this is the first time in the history of our country when an attempt has been made to extend such powers to peacetime. But the committee decided to put into this measure every protection which it thought it could, and which it thought was possibly justified, and therefore there is, if the Senator will permit the use of the expression, a sort of tying up of various things to protect persons affected by the measure, and the bringing in of the provisions of the unfair labor practices act, so that an employer may not take advantage of the fact that the Government has called upon certain of his employees to come into the Government service for a year, and not take them back.

I think if the Senator favors the spirit of this measure, which I am sure he does, he can offer an amendment to the amendment which will add more protection to those persons than the amendment already gives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Connecticut on the amendment has expired.

Mr. DANAHER. Of course, I have further time on the joint resolution.

Mr. President, I should like not to yield further to the Senator from Utah, in view of the shortness of my speaking time, but I thank the Senator from Utah for his courtesy and for his cooperation in this matter.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. No; not just now. Let me develop my thought.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator——

Mr. DANAHER. I know what the Senator wants, and I will come back to it.

Mr. President, let me point out that the moment this measure becomes law and the moment the component reserves are ordered into Federal service—not called out, as under existing law, but ordered into active military service—the commissioning of the officers will follow the order, and there will be no opportunity whatever under existing law for any officer to resign. The Federal statutes are absolutely barren of an opportunity for any officer to resign except upon the acceptance of his superior, who is, in fact, the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army. There is no statutory authority whatever under which these men will be able to protect themselves if, in their own judgment, the economic welfare of their families and their dependents, and their influence and status in their respective communities, may be injured by a year's service in the active military branch of the United States Army.

Mr. President, it seems to me when we are confronted with the inequitable situation thus arising, that the very least we can do is to give these men—116,000 in the Officers' Reserve Corps, approximately 228,000 in the National Guard, and I do not know how many thousands on the retired list—the opportunity of assaying and judging their own situation. If, on the same voluntary basis on which they previously aspired to and assumed the status which they today hold in the respective services, they equally voluntarily wish to go forward and remain amenable to the law, then it should be on their option, and in that spirit there would be legally justifiable action so far as they individually are concerned.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. May not a Reserve officer resign at the present time if he so desires?

Mr. DANAHER. Under the law, he may not. He has no right whatever to resign. He may tender his resignation, but its acceptance depends solely and entirely upon the whim and will of the Commander in Chief of the forces.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator contend—and I am asking for information—that at any time prior to the call of the President, a member of the National Guard may not resign to the Governor of his State?

Mr. DANAHER. At the present moment he may.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, the passage of the joint resolution would not change that situation. At the present time a member of the National Guard may resign to his own Governor?

Mr. DANAHER. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. He does not have to take up the matter with any Federal officer?

Mr. DANAHER. That is correct at this moment, under existing law.

Mr. NORRIS. Until the National Guard is called out by the President, would not any member of the National Guard have the right to resign to his own Governor?

Mr. DANAHER. No; for the reason explained so carefully yesterday by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], supported by the decisions which he read into the RECORD, to the effect that immediately upon the order of the President he becomes a member of the National Guard of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I have admitted that. Why may not National Guard members resign prior to the order of the President?

Mr. DANAHER. Under existing law National Guard officers may resign to the Governors of their respective States. Officers in the Officers' Reserve Corps may not.

Mr. NORRIS. The passage of the joint resolution by Congress would not take away the right of a National Guard officer to resign to the Governor of his State.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me say to the Senator from Nebraska that the burden of the argument of the Senator from Vermont was to the effect that the Senator's question should be answered in the affirmative.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the language of the joint resolution, the President is authorized from time to time, during the period until 1942, to call out any or all of the National Guard.

Mr. DANAHER. That is correct; with all other components.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand; but suppose that under the provisions of the joint resolution he should order into training on the 1st of September the National Guard of Kentucky. Until the 1st of September any member of that organization might still resign to his Governor. But suppose the President should not order into service the National Guard from Connecticut, New Hampshire, or Maine until the 1st of January; it is still true that until the 1st of January, when he is ordered into training, a member of the National Guard might still resign to the Governor of his State. Is not that true?

Mr. DANAHER. That is what the Senator from Kentucky contends, and that is the implication of what the Senator from Nebraska says. However, I do not understand that to be the conclusion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BARKLEY. The joint resolution does not change the status of any National Guard organization until the President has actually ordered it into training. It is subject to order at any time, but until the President actually exercises his authority its status is not changed.

Mr. DANAHER. I think the Senator is missing the point. I now see fully what he is getting at. The Committee on Military Affairs, or the Judge Advocate General's Department, has put in line 9, on page 1, the words "with or without their consent."

Mr. BARKLEY. That language pertains to the President's order calling them into service.

Mr. DANAHER. No; I think the Senator from Kentucky had better read section 18 of the act of June 15, 1933, appearing in Fortieth Statutes, page 160, where he will find that the question of the consent of the individual is dealt with. In order to avoid the effect and protection of that very statute, those who drafted the joint resolution put in line 9, on page 1, the words "with or without their consent."

Mr. President, I have a very few minutes left. Let me briefly, in conclusion, submit that the joint resolution on its face does not give adequate protection to hundreds of thousands of men who, under circumstances of fairness and equity, ought to decide whether or not their individual status will presently justify their being answerable to the order into active military service. In the second place, in my judgment, the joint resolution as drawn does not, as a matter of law, protect those who are employees of employers named in section 3, subparagraph (b), clause (B).

I believe further, Mr. President, that as to the hundreds of thousands of men who are on the retired list and who are officers in the Officers' Reserve Corps, and for whom no provision for resignation at present exists, there should be an opportunity within a reasonable time—which I have arbitrarily set at 20 days in the amendment which is pending—to decide whether or not they wish to continue answerable to the call for active military service anywhere in the Western Hemisphere. Remember, this is not training. This is active military service.

On those premises, Mr. President, I draw the conclusion that fairly and equitably, since we are suspending the protection we previously gave those men, if the Congress should declare a national emergency we should give them the opportunity and the option, at their choice, of resignation. If thereafter they choose to continue, they will have made their choice, and at their option may go forward and serve if and when called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to some of the testimony before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs with reference to the question whether or not the National Guard ought to be called out, and more particularly to the question whether or not, under the terms of the joint resolution, we should call out men who do not wish to be called out, and who therefore perhaps should not be called out.

The committee had before it two witnesses who spoke for the National Guard. One was General Williams, Chief of the National Guard Bureau. Previous to his appointment to that office he had been adjutant general of the National Guard of the State of Missouri. He is today a National Guard officer temporarily on duty in Washington as Chief of the National Guard Bureau. The other witness was Gen. Milton A. Reckord, who is today adjutant general of the State of Maryland, and who is the chairman of the legislative committee of the National Guard Association. For many years—certainly during the 15 or 16 years I have been in Congress—General Reckord has held that position and has really been what we might term the Washington representative of the National Guard Association, which association is composed of the officers and men who constitute the National Guard of the United States.

General Williams, in testifying before the committee, said this:

> Ninety-eight percent of them—

Speaking, of course, for the National Guard officers and men—

> I would say, are anxious to get into the service and get the training which they feel they should have in view of the present condition of world affairs.

General Reckord said:

> The National Guard as an institution—that is, the National Guard of the United States—and the Adjutant General Association have gone on record officially in favor of some such legislation as this. * * * We want the guard to be ordered to duty for not less than a year, because we believe, as well as others, that the guard does need intensive training, and the sooner we can get to it the better it will be.

For the past 2 years the National Guard Bureau in Washington has been putting forth its best efforts to get out of the National Guard men who, because of dependents or for some other good reason, perhaps would be put to too great a sacrifice if called into the Federal service; and during the past few weeks the National Guard Bureau has been putting on a drive, so to speak, in an effort to get such men out of the National Guard. The National Guard Bureau, as an agency of the Federal Government, may not discharge them, because, as has been so well brought out, until they actually go into the Federal service they are under the control of their respective States and State Governors, and they may be discharged only by State authority. However, as General Williams says:

> Our letters of instructions to the States, which were sent out a few weeks ago, advised that all enlisted men from the first three grades, from the grade of sergeant on down, if they claimed dependents, that the States were authorized and urged to replace them. We couldn't tell them to, because under the law in time of peace it is a State function, and the discharge of men in the guard is a State function, and the appointment of officers is a State function. So we urged them to get rid of them.

That is, the National Guard Bureau in Washington has urged the States and the National Guard authorities in the States to get rid of any men who might be put to too great a sacrifice, or who might present cases in which it would not be wise to call the men into service. General Williams testified that for 2 years they had been trying to do this; that some 2 years ago when they made a survey of the situation they found that perhaps about 8 percent of the men in the National Guard ought to be replaced for one good reason or another, and that, due to the efforts that had been made, he would estimate today that 8 percent had been reduced to only about 3 percent. So, according to the testimony of General Williams, some 97 percent of the National Guard today are ready for this Federal service, and the National Guard Bureau is endeavoring to eliminate the 3 percent that, because of dependency or some other good reason, ought not perhaps to be called into the service.

Let me say that I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that these men ought not to be called into the service because it may be they were not told that perhaps at a particular date there would arise the particular situation which now confronts the Nation and they would be called into the service. Every man knows when he enlists in the National Guard that he is enlisting with the idea that his service will be available to his State and to the Federal Government when and if his services are needed.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. HILL. The man who joins the National Guard joins it with the very idea in mind that he may be called into the service under some such condition as confronts the country today. I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator. Is not the effect to be given to the Senator's present argument that, insofar as the National Guard is concerned, they are entitled to resign if they choose? In point of fact, the National Guard have been trying to get those who ought to resign to do so. Therefore, if this amendment were to be adopted, it would not apply to the National Guard, anyway.

Mr. HILL. But the Senator's amendment is entirely different from that.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the Senator a further question. Is it not a fact that everything he has said so far in nowise applies to the Officers' Reserve Corps or to the other components?

Mr. HILL. I will get to that in a moment.

Mr. DANAHER. Very well.

Mr. HILL. Of course, the difference between what the Senator's amendment would do and what I have said we are proposing to do is that the Senator's amendment would permit any man in the National Guard to resign within 20 days without any good cause, without any good reason for resigning. The amendment of the Senator would permit any one of the 242,000 men in the National Guard today to resign and walk out without a single man being left in the National Guard.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. Let me say a word or two further, and then I will yield. All these years the Federal Government has been spending hundreds of millions of dollars clothing the National Guard, equipping the National Guard, training the National Guard, preparing the National Guard, having officers of the Regular Army assigned to duty with the National Guard so that they may obtain proper training and proper instruction. As the Senator from Connecticut must know, most of the officers of the National Guard draw each year from the Federal Treasury approximately $500. We pay them that money to encourage them to be in the National Guard, so that we may have the National Guard fit and available for service when a condition confronts the country such as confronts it today. It is absurd and ridiculous to stand on this floor and imply that perhaps by calling out the National Guard we are doing something that nobody had previously contemplated.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator not have regard to the fact that the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Nebraska have already pointed out that all the members of the National Guard can tender their commissions to the Governors of the States who appointed them? Is not that a fact?

Mr. HILL. They can tender their commissions, but whether or not the tender of the commissions would be accepted would depend upon the State authority. I would not say that the National Guard of the United States, the enlisted men, noncommissioned officers, and commissioned officers, may all walk out today if they see fit to do so. The truth is the National Guard men have a term of enlistment. Enlisted personnel go in for a 3-year period, the original enlistment, and then they have a subsequent enlistment for the duration of a year's time.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HILL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Then, is it not a fact, in the light of the explanation of the Senator, that all these National Guard men, according to his very argument, are bound, and there is no opportunity now for them to decide, if this joint resolution shall be enacted into law, whether they will or will not answer to a year's active military service. Is not that so?

Mr. HILL. No; I would say that for any good reason, any good cause, such as dependency or being engaged in some business or occupation which is more important to the national defense than that they should have this National Guard training or some other good cause, they can get out, but I do not say that after they have enlisted for a 3-year period they can all walk up and say, "We are quitting today." No, I do not say that, and when they are drawing their pay each month from the Federal Government, as each and every one of them, from the lowest private up to the highest officer does, they take that pay knowing that the Government is paying them under a responsibility on their part. If the Government needs them the Government can call them.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I will be glad to yield, but the Senator knows there is a limit on the time for debate.

Mr. DANAHER. Very well, I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. HILL. The Senator asked about the Reserves. The Reserve officers hold commissions as officers in the Reserve of the Army of the United States. There can be but one reason for having that Reserve, there can be but one reason, Mr. President, for issuing Reserve commissions and spending the money to train these men, and that reason is that they may be available when the Government needs them. Remember the Reserve officer has nothing to do with the States, he has no connection with the National Guard or the militia of the States, he is a Reserve officer of the Army of the United States, a Reserve officer of the Army of the Federal Government and the very purpose of commissioning him, the very purpose of training him, providing schools for him to go to and sending him to summer encampments is that he may be ready when the Federal Government needs him to be called into service.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. GILLETTE. I do not want to encroach on the Senator's time, but I am sure the Senator does not desire to be understood as saying that the National Guard men enlisted with any idea or thought or conception that they could be ordered into the service under the conditions proposed by the pending joint resolution, for instance, to serve in South America without the declaration of an emergency?

Mr. HILL. I would say that when a man takes the oath, becomes a member of the National Guard of the United States, and takes his pay from the Federal Government each month, he knows that he is subject to be called by the Federal Government whenever there is such a condition in this country that the Congress feels that it is its duty to pass a law to authorize the President to call that guard into service.

Mr. GILLETTE. When Congress declares that an emergency exists.

Mr. HILL. That is just what we are doing; we are passing this legislation now authorizing the President to call the guard into service.

So far as the Committee on Military Affairs is concerned—I think I am accurate, and if I am in error I wish the chairman of the committee to correct me—there has been no indication from any National Guard man, or any National Guard organization, or any Reserve officer or Reserve Officers' Association except that each of them and all of them are not only ready to answer this call but that, viewing the situation in the world as it is today, they feel that they should be called, so that they may receive the training which they feel to be so necessary. By the passage of the pending joint resolution, we are doing the very thing the Congress had in mind should be done and would be done in the light of such a situation when the Congress passed the National Defense Act of 1920, when we set up the Army of the United States, composed of the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, and the other reserve components. That, as I have said, is the reason why we, representatives of the Federal Government, have gone into the Federal Treasury and taken out hundreds of millions of dollars to clothe and equip and prepare these men, in order that they might be ready for just such a situation as confronts us today; and it is absurd, to my mind, even to think about an amendment such as that suggested by the Senator from Connecticut that will permit any man in the National Guard, no matter what his reason might be, no matter what his whim might be, to quit now after he has received this pay, this training, and this preparation from the Federal Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

Mr. DANAHER. On the amendment I ask for the "yeas" and "nays."

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will be rejected. Every man called under this joint resolution, if it shall be enacted, can be discharged for good cause at any time. To give this proposed authority for wholesale discharges, regardless of any reason, would be demoralizing to the machinery for discharges already set up, and it seems to me would be a reflection on the legislation.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], on which he has demanded the yeas and nays. Is the demand seconded?

Mr. DANAHER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that suggestion? I desire to make a remark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut withhold his suggestion?

Mr. DANAHER. I gladly withhold it, and am happy to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I believe some of our troubles are imaginary. As I understand—and I expect to vote for this proposed legislation with that understanding and that belief—the real objective to be attained by this measure is the training of several hundred thousand men, many of whom are already partially trained. My idea is that that is what will come out of this joint resolution—the training, or the completion of the training, of several hundred thousand men, who will then be in shape to enter the service of their country if, by any possible contingency, it should become involved in any war in which their services are needed.

My understanding is—and I should like to be corrected if I am in error—that up to the time the President calls out the National Guard, any member of the National Guard, private or officer, may resign, regardless of what the Federal Government wants him to do. He may resign to the Governor of his State. I think that will take care of most of the cases of men who ought not to be called into active service. I should feel favorable to any amendment which provided for the exemption, upon proper showing, of men who are called into the service. I do not think, however, it ought to be absolutely left to the man himself.

The other day I received a letter from the commanding officer of a National Guard unit. I thought it was a very beautiful letter. He said in the letter that it was the unanimous opinion of the members of his unit—I think there were 75 or 80 men in the unit—that they should be called into training by the President of the United States. He wanted this joint resolution passed; but he said:

> There are some of our members—

It was in a town of about five or six thousand persons—> for whom a call to immediate service would mean a great hardship, and they ought to be exempted. There are very few of them.

He said there would not be to exceed 10 or a dozen such men in his company; and he said:

> We are talking the matter over now with those men and with their comrades, and are taking steps to get them out of the National Guard prior to any call the President may issue.

In addition to that, he said:

> There are quite a number of young men who are not members of the guard who want to be members of it, and would be if they knew they were to be called into active training under the joint resolution which is now pending before Congress.

So he thought the membership of the guard would be increased.

It seems to me that a man such as the one the Senator has described, having a dependent as he has, ought to be exempted. I am laboring under the impression that as a matter of practical application of this measure he will be exempted, and that he may get out of the guard at any time before the President issues his call.

I think the members of the National Guard are anxious to have this joint resolution enacted. They want the training. They are not thinking of going to war. They are thinking in terms of preparation, in terms of the training they will receive in the 12 months. They are anxious to get it, regardless of whether there comes a greater emergency than now exists or whether there does not; and I believe most of these difficulties will iron themselves out.

I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], the chairman of the committee. He has just said there will be ample opportunity for those who have cause to get out of the service to do so if a call is made.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct under the law?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming that to be true, I do not see any necessity for the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to ask a parliamentary question. What is the amendment in the joint resolution now pending to which the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut applies?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will restate the amendment for the information of the Senator from Nebraska.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, after line 17, it is proposed to add a new subsection to read, as follows:

> (f) Any person now subject to the provisions of section 1 may resign his status within 20 days after the approval of this joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me ask another question. Has the amendment commencing on line 8 of page 3 and ending on line 11 of page 3 been agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been agreed to, as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. And was section (B) also agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Section (B) was also agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it has seemed to me all the time that section (B)—I do not know that it is very material—has not any place in the joint resolution. I think everybody agrees that if a man is called to military service, and he has a job, he ought to get that job back when and if he gets out of the military service; but when a man is employed by a private person or a private corporation, I very much doubt whether Congress has the authority to say that he shall be taken back. I very much doubt whether it would be fair, even if we could do so, for us to say to a private corporation or a private individual that within a given time it or he must take back Mr. A and give him a certain kind of job. It depends entirely upon local circumstances. It may not be possible for the employer to do that. It may be an absolute impossibility. If he is a patriotic citizen he will try to do that if he can.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That idea is embodied in the amendment itself.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment says "unless the employer's circumstances have so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to do so"; but it seems to me that makes the language useless as a matter of law, because I think that condition exists anyway. It is not any more than a notice that a man will be taken back if possible. If the employer is a patriotic citizen, he will do that anyway.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The committee was endeavoring to do what it could on this subject. It realized that this is a new field of operation, but it was trying to do everything it could to safeguard the employment of the man who is called into active service.

Mr. NORRIS. I doubt very much if the language has any legal effect, which provides that if an employer refuses to take back a man, and complaint is made, it becomes a violation of the Labor Relations Act.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That may be true. Nevertheless, we are making the effort.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand; but while the effort undoubtedly has a noble purpose, and every patriotic citizen wants to see the objective accomplished, I am afraid, as the Senator from Connecticut has suggested, that a layman who might enlist in the guard and get into the service in that way, realizing that this language that we are putting into the law is in it, would think that it had legal effect, and later on would find to his disappointment that the language had no legal effect whatever. I would rather see it out, but I do not know that it will do any great damage if it stays in.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, we made the same amendment to the military-training bill.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I have no doubt in my own mind as to the proper interpretation of the joint resolution as it is written at the present time. However, in view of the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Connecticut, and in view of the position he takes with respect to a proper construction of the joint resolution as now written, I thought it apropos that I should say a word or two because of my position with the National Guard in Illinois, realizing that in the next few months to come several questions may be asked by guard members with respect to this very important question.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator is judge advocate general of the National Guard of Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. HILL. In other words, any question of law which came before the Illinois National Guard would be passed on by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct about that.

The Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from Alabama, and the Senator from Texas are all agreed that no individual would be prohibited from resigning from the National Guard prior to the time when he was ordered out by the Commander in Chief of the Army, who is the President of the United States.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. I believe that is the proper interpretation of the act. If the Senator will permit me to finish the point——

Mr. TAFT. I desired to ask whether that did not require the consent of the Governor of the State, and if the Governor refused to agree, then the resignation would not have effect.

Mr. LUCAS. I shall touch on that in a moment, if the Senator will permit me.

In view of the argument made by the Senator from Connecticut—and I respect his ability and his judgment as a lawyer on questions of importance—I thought it the better part of wisdom to rise at this moment for the purpose of asking the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], who I consider one of the able lawyers in this body, to give his opinion upon this question, because, as I understood a few moments ago, while the Senator from Vermont was absent from the Chamber the Senator from Connecticut said, in substance, that he understood the Senator from Vermont to say yesterday, in his constitutional argument on the measure before the Senate, that once this measure became the law, from that time on it would be impossible for any man in the National Guard of the United States to resign. That seems to be the controversy here, and the Senator from Connecticut was relying upon the Senator from Vermont, and I should be delighted to have the Senator from Vermont express his opinion upon that question before we vote upon the amendment.

Mr. DANAHER rose.

Mr. LUCAS. Did I correctly state to the Senator from Vermont what the Senator from Connecticut said yesterday?

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me correct the Senator only in this particular, that at no time did the Senator from Vermont, so far as I know, discuss the matter of resignation. What he did discuss was the distinction between the National Guard of the United States and the National Guard of a State, and I was relying upon the explanation of the Senator from Vermont, with which explanation I concurred, as to when a member of the National Guard of a State becomes a member of the National Guard of the United States. That is the point I sought to make.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not disagree with the Senator from Connecticut or the Senator from Vermont upon that question; but there is a tremendous distinction between what the Senator from Connecticut says now and what I understand he relied upon as having been stated by the Senator from Vermont yesterday. If I may, I still should like to have a statement from the Senator from Vermont upon that legal question.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut is correct in stating that I did not discuss the question of resignation at all. As he has said, I did discuss the distinction between the status of a person while he is in the National Guard of a State and that of the same person when he becomes a member of the National Guard of the United States. I think there is a difference in his rights with respect to resignation; that is, while he is still a member of the National Guard, he may resign, with the consent of the State, but the moment he becomes a member of the National Guard of the United States, he comes under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and the question whether, being a member of the Military Establishment of the United States, he may resign, depends upon the facts. I know I have sometimes participated in getting young men out of the Army or Navy, when mothers have applied to me, because circumstances had changed since the boys enlisted, or for some other reason. For example, in one case a boy who had enlisted in the Navy was continually seasick, and I was able to get him out of the Navy. There was good cause shown, and the exercise of discretion permitted his getting out for cause.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator say now that in the event this joint resolution shall be enacted as it is written, an individual who is now in the service, we will say, in the National Guard of the State of Illinois, immediately becomes subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and under no circumstances can offer his resignation to the Governor of his State?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I have not made that claim. Let me make it clear, if I have given that impression, that I did not mean that. The enactment of this measure would merely enlarge the power of the President.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with that.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is all it would do. It would not result in calling out the National Guard or any other Reserve component of the Army. The joint resolution itself does not operate in that way. It merely adds to the power of the President of the United States temporarily. The joint resolution is limited to the period ending in June 1942, and it is only during that period that it increases the authority of the President. If he exercises the authority, and a National Guard man passes from the service of his State into the service of the Federal Government, thereupon his status changes.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct. The President of the United States has to exercise the power delegated to him under the proposed act, before the present status of the guardsmen changes.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is true.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. If the Senator from Connecticut will wait a moment, I should like to finish my answer with reference to existing law. I refer to section 111, about which we are speaking. I read from that section:

> All persons so ordered into the active military service of the United States shall from the date of such order stand relieved from duty in the National Guard of their respective States.

That marks the time of change, does it not?

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct. I thank the Senator from Vermont for his explanation and statement. I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from Illinois. My question is to be directed to the Senator from Vermont. I am correct in saying, am I not, that there is no statutory authorization for resignation by a member of the National Guard of the United States, or of the Officers' Reserve Corps, or of the inactive officers?

Mr. AUSTIN. I have never seen one.

Mr. DANAHER. One other question: There is this additional power, under the pending joint resolution, to the power already referred to by the Senator from Vermont, as I understand, that is, that whereas the existing law requires that the Congress declare a national emergency before the National Guard of a State can be ordered into active Federal service, if we enact the joint resolution the President by a mere order could order into active service any or all members of any or all reserve components of the Army.

Mr. AUSTIN. I so understand.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate very long, but it seems that I should make a few more remarks in connection with the argument upon the pending amendment.

There are a great number of men in the National Guard throughout the United States who do not understand what the Congress of the United States is doing at this moment. For instance, in the State of Illinois the National Guard are proceeding on the theory that the moment they finish a 3 weeks' training tour in Camp Sparta, Wis., they will probably be called out immediately as a component part of the Army of the United States and then sent on to Texas for another year's training.

In fact, certain officers of the Illinois National Guard have already flown to Texas to look over a camp where they expect to train. But in running through the report made by the Committee on Military Affairs I find that General Marshall, in his testimony before the committee, suggested to the committee that under the authority of the measure now before us there will be brought into the active military service of the United States only certain units of the National Guard, and I note that most all of these units are Coast Artillery outfits. I fully understand the significance of that move.

In the State of Illinois we have approximately 10,000 men in the National Guard, and from conversations I have had with the officers of the guard I know that they are expecting to be called out immediately following the training now in progress. Yet, according to the testimony of General Marshall, the only part of the Illinois National Guard which will be called out in the first instance is the Two Hundred and Second Coast Artillery, which is composed of some 300 men. There is a possibility that none of the other men of the guard will be called out, as I view the situation. So it does seem to me that such may be an additional argument why the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut should not be agreed to, because there is the possibility that many of the men in the National Guard of Illinois, for instance, will never be called out at all during this emergency.

Of course, there is a possibility that all 10,000 of them will be called out in due course of time, but in the first instance some 300 men in the Two Hundred and Second Coast Artillery group are to be called. When the next 300 or the next 1,000 are to be called no one knows. That will depend upon circumstances and conditions as they arise in the future. I hope I am right about this, but, if I am not, I want members of the Military Affairs Committee to inform me, because it becomes very important throughout the country to stabilize the mental condition of these men with respect to what they may or may not be compelled to do. Senators can readily see that if an entire National Guard in one State is expected to be called out, and in the first instance General Marshall calls for only some 300 of them, and sends them, as is suggested in this report, to Camp Logan, Ill., for training, they should know about that.

So, Mr. President, under the circumstances I cannot by the widest stretch of the imagination conceive how it can be said that simply because we pass this measure, with every man in the Illinois National Guard not knowing whether he is going to be called out at all, he would immediately become subject to the Federal jurisdiction to the point where he could under no circumstances tender his resignation to the Governor of his respective State. I maintain that until the order is issued by the Commander in Chief he still has the same rights he has at the present time under the State laws and regulations with respect to resigning.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Under the present law a man does not have an absolute right to resign.

Mr. LUCAS. He has the right to tender his resignation to the Governor, and the Governor may either accept it or reject it.

Mr. CONNALLY. But an enlisted man cannot resign?

Mr. LUCAS. I am talking about the National Guard.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes. If a man enlists for 3 years the Governor is under no obligation to accept his resignation.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not know what the practice has been in other States, I will say to the Senator from Texas, but the turn-over in the National Guard of Illinois annually has been around 20 or 25 percent. In other words, they have in no cases enforced the strict and rigid rules.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Governor may accept the resignation if he wants to, but there is no obligation on him to accept the resignation of an enlisted man who signs up for a period of 3 years or 5 years.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct. However, I am making the distinction between the statute of the State controlling resignations and the proposition under the pending measure.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah rose.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator from Utah desire to ask a question?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I was going to make a few remarks in my own time.

Mr. LUCAS. I yield the floor.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I made the statement during the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] that I favored his amendment with respect to resignation, and in spite of all that has been said, I still favor his amendment, and I hope it will be incorporated in the measure. I think that if we would all get the spirit of these measures as they have been planned, and understand how they actually would work, many of these misgivings and many of these questions would not arise.

For example, there are in the United States Army today about 15,000 officers. In the National Guard there are about a like number—14,000 or 15,000. In the Officers' Reserve Corps there are 120,000. That makes available, if all were to be called into the service of the United States, 149,000 commissioned officers.

Figuring on a basis of 20 men to an officer, if all the officers are called into service and we build all the components up on the ratio of 20 men to an officer, if we use all these officers we shall have an army of 2,900,000 men. Thinking of the training part of this measure, I am of the opinion that there will never be in training an army of that size, and there should not be. It is not necessary or proper.

We should also remember that among the approximately 120,000 Reserve officers, many have gained through age and through study, seniority standing. Many of them would not be available for training today. This holds true all the way down through the Reserves, the National Guard, and all connected with this contemplated call for training. If when we are thinking about this measure and the other one, we emphasize the word "selective," instead of the idea of "universal," we will catch the spirit of the measure.

The Army of the United States wants to do things in an orderly way. It is interesting to note that as soon as it was reported in the newspapers that the National Guard might be called into the Federal service for training, the Governors of the respective States became exercised for fear they might be left without military units within their States. They wanted provision made for the organization of a home guard, or something, to take the place of the National Guard.

If we reflect on the experiences we have actually heretofore had, we will realize that there is no necessity for this uncertainty. There is not going to be a turning of our whole country inside out, or the gathering together of great numbers of men. It all will be extremely orderly. If the selective service idea works, we shall find that its spirit will underlie every one of the actions contemplated by the Army, and that there will be no disorderly process.

For example, notice has been given of the branches and types of service that will be called on for training first. This does not contemplate the whole National Guard. It is the desire to train those components which are most needed, and which should be built up.

Let us confine ourselves for a minute to the National Guard and see what happens with respect to it. The National Guard organization, as I said the other day, is at best a skeleton organization, both as to officers and men—more so as to men than as to officers. The moment the guard becomes a part of the Army of the United States its status is changed. It will be built up. Its skeleton form will no longer exist. Today, in each of the units of the National Guard of the United States, which should carry 200 men under complete and full organization, probably there are not more than 60 or 70 men. Each unit is merely a skeleton.

Of those 60 or 70 men there always will be found in any National Guard organization which has been in existence for a number of years a number of unavailables; that is, men who would not be called for this sort of work but who have stayed in the guard out of loyalty to the organization. Some are in the guard because they like the training once a year. It gives them the best vacation they can get. They may be fathers of families, and under the selective draft theory they would not be available for this kind of training without great hardship. There are thousands of others who would want to be available for this training, and the selective-service law takes into consideration the fact that the guard will build itself greatly by getting men who want to be available.

We now come down to the way in which the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will actually work—and that is why I support the amendment. The amendment will make it possible for the men who are uncertain and who are worried, to become very certain about their status. One hundred and twenty thousand Reserve officers will not be called into training. Yet each one is uncertain because of newspaper reports about this measure and about what is happening. Each one is making an inventory of his own affairs, and it is very much better for the Army which calls him that he should do so.

Senators may imagine that there will be a rush of resignations whenever the call for duty threatens; but most men who have had any military service at all or who have been connected with any military service long for the time of active duty; they welcome this call for a year's training, and they all want it if they can possibly get it. Others who are not subject to the call would also like it.

There will be no scarcity of officer material in the United States for this training. The training will be selective, and the man who goes will realize that he is being honored among his fellows. There will be no resignations in the face of duty; but the right to resign should be put into the law because of the temporary character of the training which is implied, so that adjustments may be made in an orderly way, and so that the man who makes adjustments will realize that he is doing what he is doing as a matter of right and because his rights are recognized by the Government of the United States.

If a great emergency should occur; if we should need the 149,000 men who are now on the list as officers; if we should need an army of 3,000,000 men, which would be required to absorb that officer personnel, then we should have an emergency indeed, and nobody would resign. Everyone knows that no one would resign. American citizens do not resign in the face of a call to duty, and no Reserve officer whom I have ever known would ever think of resigning in the face of a call to duty. No National Guard member who has ever been recognized by the Federal Government, who has ever received a commission, or has ever passed an examination and who understands what it means, would resign in the face of duty.

This training is selective. It is entirely a privilege, not an obligation, not a risk. It is entirely a privilege, and should be thought of as a privilege. The Army of the United States is extending something to the National Guard and to the Reserves which every American Army officer has desired to have since he had shoulder straps put upon him. Under those circumstances, if we understand the spirit of the thing, and if we remember that General Marshall himself said that the spirit of the selective draft idea would govern the actions of his Department, we can see that by this simple amendment we can remove many of the uncertainties in the minds of scores and scores of officers who want to have their own activities and their own welfare considered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is a member of the Military Affairs Committee; is he not?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am.

Mr. LUCAS. Was this question discussed with General Marshall when he appeared before the committee?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The resignation question?

Mr. LUCAS. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Not that I know of. The resignation question probably had no place in our discussion. It is something which has been brought up on the floor.

Mr. LUCAS. Did the committee take up the question at all during the hearings, and discuss it with anyone?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Not while I was present. I think the chairman of the committee will bear me out in that statement.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The committee did not deal with the matter.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The amendment was offered on the floor. It has been considered only on the floor, and I am offering my remarks in what I think is harmony with the two great acts we have before us.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let me ask the Senator whether or not he recalls what General Marshall, General Williams, and General Reckord had to say on the matter? I do not know whether or not General Marshall made such a statement, but certainly General Reckord and General Williams pointed out to the committee the policy of the Government to encourage resignations, stating that within the past month opportunity had been tendered to officers of the National Guard to hand in their resignations. I believe the same opportunity was extended to other components of the Reserve. I ask the Senator what his recollection is on that subject?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am sure that they all expressed the same spirit which we have been discussing. Take the case of a man who is not an officer, and who earns $100 a month, and is the father of five or six children. Under the draft act his service would be deferred, but under the National Guard call there would be no opportunity for deferring his service. We asked General Marshall point blank if the spirit of the draft act would be used in calling the guard, and he said it certainly would be used. I know from actual practice that it would be. Let me add that these men all expressed the idea that the National Guard would welcome the call for a year's training and service. I think there is no doubt of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the terms of the selective-draft bill as it is presented, and under any well-thought-out selective-draft system, any person who comes within certain categories may claim exemption.

He may waive the exemption, but the Government of the United States, or the agencies set up by the law, have some voice in determining whether or not the service of any individual shall be deferred, or whether or not he shall be exempted. However, the language of the amendment does not seem to give the Government of the United States, or even the Governor of a State, any voice in the matter. It gives the members of these components, for a period of 20 days, the right to resign. It might be interpreted as a command to the Governor of a State to accept the resignation of any member of the National Guard, regardless of his situation, and also a command to the President of the United States to accept the resignation of any Reserve officer. It seems to me, therefore, that there is a difference between a selective-service provision, in which the Government and its agencies are authorized to make some decision as to whether or not any individual is exempt or whether or not his service should be deferred, and the language of the amendment, which it seems to me gives him the unconditional right to resign. He may resign within 20 days, and the resignation must be accepted. Has the Senator given any thought to that difference?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. No; I have not given any thought to it, but I have thought of a resignation following the ordinary course which resignations follow in the military branches.

Mr. BARKLEY. Anyone may resign anything, but the resignation does not always have to be accepted.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. No.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think that the members of the National Guard who have not been called into service may still exercise their right to resign to the State Governor.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then, of course, it is up to the Governor or the State authorities under State law to determine whether or not the resignation shall be accepted.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Under the theory of resignation, I accept the principle of mutuality. The person who accepts the resignation must be desirous of accepting it.

Mr. BARKLEY. An amendment of this sort is not required to give any man in the National Guard the right to tender his resignation.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Certainly not.

Mr. BARKLEY. He may tender his resignation, but, it seems to me, that the language of the amendment gives him the right not merely to tender his resignation but to resign and have his resignation accepted.

I am not uneasy about any great exodus from the National Guard as the result of such an amendment as this, but I think I am correct in my theory that until the President exercises his authority to order any National Guard contingent into service or into training, the members of such contingent have the same rights which they now have.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I think so.

Mr. BARKLEY. I believe I am correct in that contention.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I think there is no doubt about it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then I do not see any need for an amendment which might be regarded as an inducement to tender an earlier resignation, simply because there is a 20-day limit, whereas members of the National Guard may resign, subject to the refusal of the State authority to accept the resignation, at any time before they are called into the Federal service by order of the President.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I think that all the Senator says holds completely for the National Guard officers; but I doubt very much whether it holds completely for members of the Reserve.

Mr. BARKLEY. The resignation of a National Guard officer or private may be accepted only by the Governor of the State, whereas in the case of Reserve officers, who have been in the United States Army but who are now in the Reserve Corps, their resignations must be accepted by the President.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The only difference is in the person who must accept the resignation.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is true; and it is because of the latter class that the amendment becomes rather essential, because we have 120,000 of such persons in varying circumstances. In addition, because the joint resolution is all-embracing, calling up all the Reserve components, it reaches even into the retired personnel of the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Utah on the amendment has expired.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I shall take time on the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 20 minutes on the joint resolution.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. If we read carefully, we see that we are putting into the law a provision for doing something which has not ordinarily been done before. We are changing the status of the retired officers of the United States Army, not directly, but by implication, and we ought to be a little thoughtful about it.

Mr. President, I have said as much as I intended to say in support of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, but before I take my seat I should like to make a statement attempting to reinforce in a way, the remarks which have been made in regard to the committee amendment designated as section 3, and to show the reason why we adopted that amendment. In order that I may not merely talk theory, but may turn to cases, I shall read this part of my remarks on the power of Congress to require private employers, whether or not engaged in interstate commerce, to reemploy men called from their employment under the proposed conscription statute.

The Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress the express power "to raise and support armies" (art. I, sec. 8, clause 12). This power is plenary and exclusive. Thus in Tarble's case (80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 408) the Supreme Court of the United States said, in refusing to enforce a writ of habeas corpus for the discharge of an enlisted soldier in the United States Army:

> Among the powers assigned to the National Government is the power "to raise and support armies," and the power "to provide for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces." The execution of these powers falls within the lines of its duties; and its control over the subject is plenary and exclusive. It can determine without question from any State authority, how the armies shall be raised, whether by voluntary enlistment or forced draft, the age at which the soldier shall be received, and the period for which he shall be taken, the compensation he shall be allowed, and the service to which he shall be assigned.

And in United States v. Williams (302 U. S. 46) the Supreme Court stated:

> In virtue of its power to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a Navy, and to make rules for the government of land and naval forces, the Congress may require military service of adults and minors alike. The power of the United States may be exerted to supersede parents' control and their right to have the services of minor sons who are wanted and fit for military service. And the Congress may * * * authorize them to enlist or draft them on such terms as it may deem expedient and just.

The Constitution likewise provides that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," including the power to raise and support armies (art. I, sec. 8, clause 18). In interpreting the scope of the implied powers granted under this clause, the Supreme Court said in the old case of McCulloch v. Maryland (17 U. S. 159, 206 (4 Wheat.) 316, 421):

> Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all the means which are appropriate, which are plainly adequate to that end, and which are not prohibited but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional. (See also Knox v. Lee (19 U. S. (12 Wall.) 457, 533, 543).)

In Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority (297 U. S. 288), which is a recent case, the Supreme Court held that Congress in the exercise of its national defense and commerce powers—and, incidentally we left out the words "in interstate commerce" in the draft of the joint resolution which is now before the Senate, despite the fact that those words were included originally—had authority to construct Wilson Dam on the Tennessee River for the production of electric power. The statute authorizing the construction of Wilson Dam was a part of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, before the United States entered the war. The Court stated:

> We take judicial notice of the international situation at the time the act of 1916—> was passed, and it cannot be successfully disputed that the Wilson Dam and its auxiliary plants are, and were intended to be, adapted to the purposes of national defense * * * the maintenance of said properties in operating condition and the assurance of an abundant supply of electrical energy in the event of war, constitute national defense assets.

And we were not in war in 1916.

> The Wilson Dam and its power plant must be taken to have been constructed in the exercise of the constitutional functions of the Federal Government.

In United States v. Gettysburg Electric R. Co. (160 U. S. 668) the Supreme Court upheld the validity of acts of Congress authorizing condemnation of land for monuments, and so forth, on the battlefield of Gettysburg as germane and appropriate to the exercise of the power to declare war and to create and equip armies and navies. In this decision the Court declared:

> The Government has the constitutional power to condemn the land for the proposed use. It is, of course, not necessary that the power of condemnation for such purpose be expressly given by the Constitution. It results from the powers that are given, and it is implied because of its necessity, or because it is appropriate in exercising those powers. Congress has power to declare war and to create and equip armies and navies. It has the great power of taxation to be exercised for the common defense and general welfare. Having such powers, it has such other and implied ones as are necessary and appropriate for the purpose of carrying the powers expressly given into effect. Any act of Congress which plainly and directly tends to enhance the respect and love of the citizen for the institutions of his country and to quicken and strengthen his motives to defend them, and which is germane to and intimately connected with and appropriate to the exercise of some one or all of the powers granted by Congress, must be valid.

The question, then, is simply whether the requirement that private employers restore to their jobs men who have been called to military duty is properly calculated to aid in the raising and supporting of an army. Of this there can be no doubt. The knowledge upon the part of men drafted for the service that their jobs will be open upon completion of their military duty is without doubt a highly important factor in sustaining and improving morale during their period of service. Likewise the imposition of such a requirement upon employers would play a significant part in lessening economic maladjustments which inevitably accompany the conscription of an army. By reason of these considerations, as well as others of a similar nature, it is plain that a provision to assure the restoration of employment after military service is necessary and proper in exercise of the power to raise and support armies, and is therefore valid under the Constitution.

Mr. President, in drafting this part of the joint resolution it seemed necessary for us to do some studying, because we were going into an entirely new field. I think, therefore, in spite of all that has been said here, the question of the constitutionality of these provisions about guaranteeing the jobs of the men who are called into the service, that which I have said is definitely in order.

I think also, Mr. President, that it should be said that if the Congress of the United States were not interested in making secure the lives of citizens of the United States in every particular, even during time of emergency and during time of training for an emergency, the Congress would be thoughtless about the welfare of the citizens of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I shall only take a few moments of the Senate's time to discuss the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

The pending joint resolution authorizes the President to call into service or order into service certain component parts of the Reserve Army of the United States, including the National Guard. Until the President orders them into service, it is my view that the status of these organizations is not changed; they are still organizations organized under the laws of the States, subject to certain laws which make them a part of the potential Army of the United States; that until and unless the President calls them into service or orders them out, there is no difference whatever in their relationship to the Government of the United States and to the respective States under which they are organized.

The language of the joint resolution provides that the President may call them from time to time. It contemplates that he does not have to call all of them at once. He may call the National Guard of my State in October or September; he may call the National Guard of Utah in January, or at any future date prior to the date fixed in the joint resolution, 1942. He may never call any of them; there may be some of them that will never be called, although I assume that they will all be called, though the President is not required to do it. Therefore, until and unless they have been ordered into the Federal service for training or for the purposes contemplated in the joint resolution, they are under the control of the State authority which authorizes their formation.

They may still resign. Their resignation must be accepted by the Governor, or it may be in some States by the adjutant general of the State, though I think in most of the States, if not all, it is in the hands of the Governor to decide. In determining whether to accept particular resignations, the Governor has the right to take into consideration all the facts pertaining to the particular individual. The same thing is true of the Reserve officers of the United States, whose resignations may be sent to the President of the United States. He may or may not accept them. In my judgment, this amendment would grant within 20 days after the passage of the joint resolution a discharge to every man affected by it on his own motion or his own volition, because if they have the right to resign, and tender their resignation to the Governor or the President, as the case may be, the President still has the right to determine whether the circumstances justify the acceptance of the resignation. What object would there be in putting in this measure a provision for a 20-day period during which any man may resign? That means he may get out. The effect of it, it seems to me, is to grant by law, within the 20-day period, an absolute discharge to anybody on his own request.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Taking into consideration the condition of the Army, the Reserve, and the National Guard, the great numbers in those organizations, and the spirit behind what we did when we passed the Army promotion bill, would not the Army welcome such resignations?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not certain about that. I do not know whether they would or not. It might depend on the character and number of them. I do not think the Army would welcome a situation in which they had no voice in determining whether or not a resignation should be accepted, and I think that is what this amendment does.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I do not know about the wording of the amendment; but, as I said to the Senator before, I assumed that the word "resignation" meant a sort of mutuality; that the officer to whom the resignation was handed would be in a position to advise, would be in a position to accept, or would be in a position to reject.

Mr. BARKLEY. The language of the amendment says:

Any person now subject to the provisions of section 1 may resign

That does not mean simply to tender his resignation with the power of somebody to reject it. It means that he may resign as a matter of right; that is, he may get out within 20 days on his own application. That is the way I interpret the language. Certainly it is a rather strange situation that we are willing to say to anybody in the National Guard or in the Reserve Corps of the United States, "All you have to do within 20 days is to say you want to quit and get out, and you are out."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, is that the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the one I am talking about.

Mr. CONNALLY. That may be done at any time after this measure passes?

Mr. BARKLEY. Within 20 days he may resign. That is an unqualified right. He may resign.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is just going back to the volunteer system. We might as well not have any draft, then.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true; that is the effect of it.

Mr. President, having said that, I do not wish to take any further time; but I wish to have read two paragraphs of a letter which I received this morning from Capt. Philip R. Ross, of the One Hundred and Thirty-eighth Field Artillery, Battery C, which is a part of the National Guard of the State of Kentucky, which, in my judgment, represents the attitude of the National Guard of my State and the State of the Senator who now happens to be presiding over the Senate (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair) with respect to this bill and the bill which is to come up later. In this connection I wish to state that my colleague, who is now presiding over the Senate, advises me that he has received a similar letter from Gen. Ellerbe Carter, who has had long experience with the National Guard of Kentucky, and has had wide experience in military affairs during most of his adult life.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

BATTERY C, ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-EIGHTH FIELD ARTILLERY,
JEFFERSON COUNTY ARMORY,
Louisville, Ky., July 30, 1940.

Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: I hold a commission as captain in the Kentucky National Guard, commanding the organization shown on this letterhead. I have a pretty good job in civil life. But I want to state that I am in favor of the compulsory service bill and that I consider such a step necessary. I also favor induction of the National Guard into Federal service, because I know how badly we need intensive training. I respectfully urge you, as the senior Senator from Kentucky, to relay this letter to Senator CHANDLER and the several Representatives from Kentucky in the House.

While I cannot speak for my brother officers, I do know that the general opinion here is overwhelmingly in favor of both bills mentioned in the preceding paragraph. We feel that inasmuch as the Federal Government has invested thousands of dollars in us, and we have been accepting Federal pay during the years of peacetime duty, we may expect to be called into Federal service in times of emergency and will gladly respond.

* * * * * * *

Respectfully,

PHILIP R. ROSS,
Captain, One Hundred and Thirty-eighth Field Artillery.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, a little earlier in the day I had a colloquy with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] with respect to the authority of the Congress to affect the jurisdiction of the inferior Federal courts. I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the wartime Draft Act of 1917, section 5, in which is found the following language:

Provided, That in the call of the docket—

This refers to proceedings in the Federal courts—precedence shall be given, in courts trying the same, to the trial of criminal proceedings under this act.

I cite that merely as a precedent showing that we have heretofore done what the Senator says we cannot now do.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

I ask any fair-minded individual to read the RECORD of yesterday and see if there was the slightest excuse for the malicious, uncalled-for, and untrue attack made by the Senator from Indiana.

I spoke about the group who were pushing the conscription bill. At no time was any reference made to the Senator from Indiana, but he seemed to feel that he desired to be included with those mentioned. I did not include him in the list. He included himself.

Furthermore, he did not answer the charges made, but immediately entered into a venomous attack upon my fine father, who cannot answer him because he is not now living. My father was an excellent man. He was a patriot. Gentlemen who disagreed with him respected him, and I emphasize the word "gentlemen." I leave it to the Senate if they would not have considered me an unworthy son of a great father if I did not rise to defend him when he was attacked and dead. Were my father living, he would have been able to answer the Senator from Indiana. Yes; even though he would have been 90 years of age, he probably would have met the Senator from Indiana personally, and would have answered him in the manner in which he should be answered. He knew no fear. My father recognized a coward when he saw one. He fought, but never hit below the belt.

My father, as I said yesterday, did oppose the entrance of the United States into the World War. He felt that we should not have been involved in that terrible conflict. He was honest enough to say so, and did it openly. My father's position has been upheld by time. He does not have to have the support of those who want to keep the war alive for their political gain. He would not want men to praise him who hoped to profit out of their war service. I hope my brother, who was also attacked and could not reply here, will personally answer the Senator as he should be answered when he comes to Washington. Let us see who will be brave.

I shall not discuss references to me. I am able to take care of myself. I shall not take the time of the Senate to answer the Senator from Indiana as I would like to do. However, my dead father has been cowardly attacked. I shall meet that challenge.

In passing, I ask the Senate to read the RECORD and note how the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] sat silently during the attack on me by the Senator from Indiana. He did not invoke the rule; but when I rose to answer, immediately the Senator from Kentucky became incensed and tried to stop my reply. It was within the rule for the Senator from Indiana viciously to attack me and my family, according to the Senator, but a violation of the rule for me to reply. I do not care to dwell on that phase, however, except to call attention to the matter.

Let us see the statements of the Senator from Indiana.

The Senator from Indiana said—and I quote him:

He has told the Senate who was at this meeting where patriots met to consider defense measures for this country. I will tell the Senate who was not there. There were not any Holts there, because the Holt family does not teach that kind of doctrine.

No; the Holts do not teach that professional patriots should stay at home and reap millions out of war. Twenty-odd thousand millionaires were created in that war. My father protested against that. No; the Holts do not teach that free speech should be destroyed and that mob rule should be substituted. My father was attacked by such a group, most of whom apologized as time proved my father right. No; the Holts do not teach that men should be allowed to raid the Treasury under the name of patriotism. No; the Holts do not believe in boys being killed on the battlefield while favorites sit in swivel chairs in Washington, far removed from the scene of action. No; the Holts are not professional pay-roll patriots.

Then the Senator from Indiana made this statement, and I quote him:

When I was over in France in 1917 and 1918 the father of the Senator from West Virginia was preaching that people should not raise any food to send me and my comrades who were fighting for this country in France.

So said the Senator from Indiana. This is a malicious misstatement of fact. My father at no time took such a position, and not a scintilla of evidence can be presented to substantiate the charge. My father wanted to feed the soldiers. I have heard him say, "Nothing is too good for the soldiers who are fighting, but nothing is too bad for those who caused them to be sent to their slaughter needlessly." That was my father's position. He was for the soldiers, but against those who forced the soldiers to be killed in the war.

The Senator from Indiana also said:

The father of the Senator from West Virginia sent his son who was eligible for service to hide away in South America to avoid the draft.

What are the facts? My father never sent any son of his to South America to avoid the draft. I do not believe the son in question was ever in South America in his entire life, certainly not to my knowledge. He went to Mexico, but not to avoid the draft. Correspondence will prove that he was offered a position there in 1916; months before the draft was inaugurated. He was in Mexico before the Draft Act was passed, but returned to this country, and registered in that draft. He asked no exemptions. He did not wait until August of 1917 to get married. He served in the Construction Division of the United States Army.

For the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I read a statement received by my brother from Brigadier General Marshall who was then in the Construction Division of the United States Army:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF CONSTRUCTION DIVISION OF ARMY,
Washington, D. C., November 15, 1919.

MATHEW S. HOLT, JR.:

On your retirement today from service in Construction Division of the Army, I desire to express my appreciation of the creditable assistance rendered by you in helping win the war.

Let me continue with the letter from Brigadier General Marshall:

The spirit of loyalty, cooperation, and the intelligent effort which characterized your service in Construction Division is one of the instruments by which the successful prosecution of its great work has been made possible.

I congratulate you on the part you have taken in the Nation's record of accomplishment, and extend to you my cordial and sincere good wishes.

R. C. MARSHALL, JR.,
Brigadier General, United States Army.

I doubt whether the Senator from Indiana can present such a letter, unless he writes it himself. This was a document sent to a man now charged with not being in the service. He asked no exemption before the draft board. He served up until November 15, 1919, a year after the war was over.

Later the Senator tried to slip into the RECORD this attack from the Clarksburg Exponent. I quote from the RECORD:

Holt of Weston spurns United States flag as Socialists cheer him.

The only possible truth back of that is that my father was a Socialist. He was a Socialist, and made no denial of it.

My father never spurned the flag. He has said many times that it is a tragedy when men take the flag and wrap themselves in that flag in order to cover up crime. He said it was a disgrace that the flag was used to make American boys sacrifice their lives to defend foreign investments. He said it was a disgrace when people refused to sing the entire Star-Spangled Banner, omitting the third verse, because they feared they would step on the feelings of England. My father loved the American flag, but he did object to its being misused. He believed it to be a symbol of liberty, meaning free speech and free press; of courage, meaning the sacrifices of his ancestors who had fought to make this land independent. I refer Members of the Senate to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to the Holts and members of my family who have served in war.

My father believed in the flag being an emblem of honor, not of selfishness. My father believed in the flag as a symbol of right, not oppression. My father believed in the flag as belonging to all, not just to the professional patriots. My father despised professional patriots. He exposed those who served in the Army and used that service for selfish, personal, political gain afterwards. He said that he always noted that the soldiers who proclaimed to the world of their service in war were those who expected to be given special favors over their comrades. The record of the Senator from Indiana on this use of his service can be checked. My father felt men should serve because they believed in the cause, not in the hope of getting political positions as a result of such service. He never felt that a brave man fought in war hoping for the reward of a seat in the United States Senate.

Why was not the Senator from Indiana fair and honorable enough to put in the reply of the other Clarksburg paper to this untrue story in one Clarksburg paper? For the RECORD, I read it:

Dr. M. S. Holt, of Weston, who has been given considerable unenviable notoriety following a report that in a speech at a Socialists' meeting in St. Louis, he has denounced the United States flag and declared that he had sent his son to South America rather than let him fight for his country, has returned home. He denies in toto the remarks accredited to him and he has sent for stenographic reports of his speech to prove to his townsmen that he made no such remarks.

At the time the report became public here the Telegram gave it no credence, and because of that fact there were expressions here and there to the effect that the Telegram had turned Socialist.

Some newspapers seized upon the occasion of the report to wrap themselves in the American flag and make a mountain out of a molehill instead of heeding the advice of the head of the Government to keep down all possible internal ugliness of word and bad feeling.

So said the Clarksburg Telegram. The Senator from Indiana had that, but did not use it.

A stenographic report of that speech proves that my father did not make the statement attributed to him by the Exponent or by the Senator from Indiana. I recall distinctly the incident, and recall my father procuring the stenographic report, which disproved what was charged.

But let us see the attitude of the paper quoted by the Senator from Indiana. He would naturally quote from a paper filled with such viciousness. I have here an editorial from that paper about my father:

> Any man who would utter such sentiments against the Nation that protects him when it is at war with a foreign foe should be strung up by the thumbs and attended to with a baseball bat.

So said the Exponent. Is not that Americanism? That was the type of democracy advocated by the Exponent in attacking my distinguished father.

Nazi-ism? Just think of this viciousness in America, and to think that the Senator from Indiana upholds it. The World War produced such hysteria where the freedom of men was attacked, where few men dared speak. The hysteria today is following the same pattern. For my expression of causes, I mean causes I believe to be right. The Senator from Indiana would advocate just such methods today in the name of democracy. The editorial referred to by the Senator from Indiana may be his gospel of Americanism. If some individuals have their way now we will find the same methods being advocated and pursued by those who follow such individuals as the Senator. I believe men have the right to express their views on national affairs. I may disagree with some of them, but I would not advocate beating or killing them by way of answer. Americanism still lives.

The Senator from Indiana read a letter purportedly written by my father. My family has no knowledge of this letter. I have no knowledge of it. Probably it is just as viciously untrue as the other statements of the Senator from Indiana.

My father was vindicated by the people of my home city. He was elected mayor thereafter. For 67 years he practiced as a physician there. No night was too dark for him to rise from his bed and minister to those who needed him. No distance was too long for him to travel if he could be of service. My father a slacker? Why, my friends, he never dodged a thing in his life, regardless of the obstacle. He lost many battles, but he fought. He never left a fight when right was at stake.

My father a slacker? Why, my friends, he would not know the word. He served without fear, expecting no favor. My father had more red blood in his little finger than some of those who attack him have in their bodies. He never misrepresented a dead man who could not reply. Let me read a tribute paid to my father by a citizen of my home city, by a man who disagreed with my father on the war, by a man who was active in all activities during that conflict. These are the words of Judge Robert Bland, a respected citizen of Weston, W. Va. He said about my father:

> He was a fighter. He was a soldier for any cause he espoused and he never backed anything that he did not believe in truly and honestly. I have known him to stand up and champion some view that he entertained and perhaps he was all alone but he fought and he fought like a soldier and never gave up. No man could say that Dr. Holt was a coward. He could stand criticism. He had the courage to stand up and maintain a position. There was a man who never hesitated, no matter under what circumstances, to stand up for those he deemed to be oppressed. He was a fighter and never, never quit. He was a fighter unto the end.

So said Judge Bland, who disagreed with my father about war, and about many things.

I may add—my father may be considered to have been a slacker in the eyes of a man who never knew him—a slacker in the eyes of a professional patriot, who wraps his service around him for a seat in the Senate—but he was a fighter in the eyes of a man who knew him well. My father may have been considered a slacker in the eyes of professional patriots, but he was a fighter in the eyes of a true American.

I am proud of my father, I want to say to the Senator from Indiana. I am proud of his courage and his patriotism and his honor. I am proud to be his son. Was he a slacker? No, he was a patriot. May the day never come when men attack my father's name that I shall not arise and defend him as he rests defenseless in his grave.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I shall not violate the proprieties of the Senate. I know the rules of the Senate. They were enacted for a high purpose. I know that parliamentary language would not permit me to express my contempt for the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. President, I suppose the Senator's father was a brave man. I have no doubt about it. I had no purpose to say that he was not. My sole purpose was to point out what his doctrine and teachings were, and to suggest that his doctrine and teachings were different from those which were inculcated in me. I have never said the Senator's father was a slacker. I said that his father did teach a slacker doctrine. I repeat it. I only wanted the country to know that when the Senator from West Virginia speaks, he is not speaking the kind of patriotism I have understood; he is not speaking the kind of patriotism I learned at my revered father's knee; and, without indulging in personal references, I dare say that my humble family has played its part as honorably and as well as has the family of the Senator from West Virginia.

My father was a "war baby" who never saw his soldier father who was killed in the Civil War. I learned the kind of patriotism at my father's knee—he is also dead—that taught me that when my country was in danger and needed men they should shoulder arms for their country; that it was my duty to do so; and in May 1917 I went, before there was a draft law.

The Senator referred sneeringly to my marrying in August of 1917, as if that was done in any way to keep me out of service. I had already registered, and I was in the Army when I registered. So the Senator cannot accuse me of using my marriage or anything else to avoid service.

I say I do not know about the doctrines preached by the Senator's father in West Virginia in the days of 1917 and 1918, except what was printed in the contemporary press of that time. It is somewhat late for the Senator to deny the statements which were published broadcast in the public press of that time. Mr. President, if the Senator's father did not make that speech in St. Louis, and he had a stenographic report of it, why did he not publish it in the Telegram that was so favorable to him in West Virginia?

The Senator from West Virginia says he does not know about the letter which I read into the RECORD yesterday; that the family does not know about it, and he denounces the Exponent for publication of the letter. But he praises the Telegram for its attitude toward his father. However, the letter I read into the RECORD yesterday was published in the Telegram, and it was reprinted in the Clarksburg Exponent on April 18, 1917. The letter was also published in the Clarksburg Telegram, and this is what it said:

> My son in the last week left America at his own volition and by desire of his mother. Why? He left to go to a country where they had peace. My son went to South America, started within the last week. He may go to Brazil, but I want him to go to a country that is at peace. I did not raise my boy for cannon fodder.

Mr. President, that was a publication in a newspaper of which the Senator approved. I do not know whether that is true, but it was published in those newspapers in those days, and there was no denial of it in any publication at that time. I am unwilling to accept the statement of the Senator from West Virginia that it is not true.

If his father did not make that speech in St. Louis and he had a stenographic copy to the contrary, why did he not publish it? There is no publication which contains that speech.

Mr. President, the Senator quoted from a fine judge in West Virginia about his father. I have no fault to find with that. I dare say his father was a brave man. It takes courage to stand up in times of stress and express your opinion, whatever it may be, especially if it is a minority opinion, and I dare say that Dr. Holt's opinion was a minority opinion. I received three telephone calls from West Virginia last night assuring me that it was and that those who called could furnish me with affidavits by the armful that the things I said were true.

The Senator quotes a fine judge in West Virginia as to what was thought about his father. I quote another fine judge from West Virginia, who is now on the Supreme Court of West Virginia, as I understand, and that is Judge Haymond Maxwell. This is what he said:

I heartily commend my Weston friends for their emphatic denunciation of the disreputable and disloyal conduct and utterances of M. S. Holt.

Mr. President, the Senator said these documentary bits of evidence are all false. If they are false, that ought to have been made of record at the time they were published, and it is a little late now to expect me at least to accept the Senator's denial.

As I said before, I had no other purpose than to draw the distinction between the doctrine on which the Senator from West Virginia was raised and the doctrine to which I adhere. My father never wrote to the newspapers or made speeches to the Socialists saying that he did not raise his boy to be a soldier.

The Senator says his father was a Socialist. Such men are called Communists today.

Mr. President, it is simply because I do not believe in such doctrines but do believe in the doctrine of defending this country when it is in distress that I thought it was worth while to call attention to the fact that the doctrine of pariotism of the Senator from West Virginia does not jibe with mine.

I do not know whether or not his brother went away to avoid the draft. That is what everyone in West Virginia says. He did go away, according to Dr. Holt's letter, to avoid serving in the armed forces of his own country. He came back, and he went into service. I do not know what kind of service—perhaps construction engineering. That is all right. I shall not reflect upon him for that; but everybody in West Virginia with whom I have talked or from whom I have heard says he went away, as his father said he did, to avoid service in the armed forces of this country.

Mr. President, that is not my idea of patriotism. I understood it to be the doctrine of slackerism, and I said so. That is all I intended to say. I simply wanted to draw a distinction between the kind of patriotism upon which I was raised and the kind which the Senator from West Virginia embraces.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I shall not take much of the time of the Senate. I do not need to do so. Anyone who heard the Senator from Indiana knows that his statement answers itself. I attacked no member of his family. I have too much courage to do that. I attacked no member of his family because I hope that I am a gentleman. I did not attack his father, his wife, or anyone else in his family. I wish I could say what I think of the Senator from Indiana, who speaks of my father being a slacker when he volunteered in the United States Army at 13 years of age. A slacker? Slacker doctrine?

The Senator from Indiana asks why I did not reply when the statement was made in the newspaper. I was 12 years of age at that time. My father did reply at that time, and the Exponent did not publish his reply.

The Senator says that he was called four times last night from West Virginia. I do not doubt it. We have some of that type of people in West Virginia. We have many, many fine people in West Virginia, and we also have a group which is very low. It is foreign to my knowledge. I do not know who called him, but no respectable citizen did.

The Senator says my father was a Socialist. He was an open socialist. He did not hide his socialism behind some political philosophy, as the Senator from Indiana tries to do. That is an insult to socialism. Oh, yes; my father was an open socialist. He advocated socialism in the name of socialism.

The Senator says that everyone in West Virginia with whom he had talked has said such things about my father. I do not doubt that. I know the class of people to whom he talked. He quoted Judge Maxwell. He did not tell the Senate that Judge Maxwell wrote that statement in the hysteria of the World War, and later apologized to my father near the State capitol in Charleston, in my presence. Among my father's letters, which I wish I had with me, will be found a written apology from Judge Maxwell for his statement. He said that he had written it in the hysteria of war, and that he was sorry for it.

One can find almost anything for which he looks. The Senator from Indiana may search the gutters of West Virginia—and we have them—and come out with many things which he cannot find elsewhere. Of course, the Senator from Indiana would naturally search there, feeling at home.

I wish to say nothing further in defense of my father. He needs no defense. The people of Weston who knew him have given him all the defense he needs. He did not preach the doctrine of slackerism, but he preached patriotism, not with the expectation of a seat in the United States Senate.

My father enlisted in the Army at 13 years of age. At no time in his political campaign did he wrap the flag around him in the hope people would send him to the United States Senate.

There are two different types of patriotism—professional patriotism and honest patriotism. My father was an honest patriot.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, sometimes in the heat of anger people say things which they do not mean. In order to keep the RECORD straight, I wish to answer a charge which was made by implication yesterday. On page 9924 the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT] made the statement:

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I do not know what caused the Senator from Indiana to get in the spirit that he has gotten into. I notice he has been going back and forth out of that door.

On page 9939 the Senator from West Virginia said:

Mr. HOLT. I thank the Senator from Kentucky.
The Senator from Indiana is not in shape to be on the floor.

By inference this statement might raise a suspicion in somebody's mind. The Senator from Indiana asked the Senator from West Virginia what he meant by that statement, but the Senator from West Virginia did not explain. The inference, however, might cause some to think that the Senator from West Virginia had charged by inference that the Senator from Indiana was drinking. Therefore, for fear some might put that interpretation upon the statement of the Senator from West Virginia I wish to say that I was sitting by the Senator from Indiana talking with him and that there was no indication whatever that he had been drinking. In fact, I have served here with the Senator from Indiana for nearly 4 years, and I have never seen him with even the slightest evidence of liquor on his breath.

Statements of the kind made by the Senator from West Virginia in the heat of debate might result in an unfair interpretation if left unchallenged in the RECORD. Therefore, I make this statement in behalf of my good friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], whose conduct as a gentleman, whose statesmanlike service and whose patriotism cannot justly be challenged. I wish to make the RECORD clear on that point.

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Oklahoma has become an expert on halitosis, and I urge him to join the Listerine Co. [Laughter.]

ACTIVE SERVICE OF NATIONAL GUARD, RESERVE, AND RETIRED PERSONNEL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 286) to strengthen the common defense and to authorize the President to order members and units of Reserve components and retired personnel of the Regular Army into active military service.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate adopted a unanimous-consent agreement that no Senator should speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes on the joint resolution or any amendment. I hope the unanimous-consent agreement will be observed by Senators, and if not, that it will be enforced by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that a Senator speaking on a question of personal privilege would automatically be entitled to speak for a longer time.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER]. The Senator from Connecticut requests the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, because as I understand the law—with all due apologies to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee [Mr. SHEPPARD]—a National Guard man may not of his own volition retire from the National Guard after he has enlisted, and during his period of enlistment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, did the Senator understand me to make such a statement?

Mr. GEORGE. I did.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I did not make such a statement.

Mr. GEORGE. I so understood the Senator, and I think the Senate so understood him.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I did not intend to make any such statement.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very glad the Senator did not, because I think that question is the crux of the whole case. I did not mean any reflection whatever upon the Senator from Texas, for he knows that I greatly admire and love him, but I did understand him to say that a member of the National Guard might now voluntarily resign.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What I meant to say was that for good cause given he could resign or be discharged.

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad the Senator has said that, and that I think, Mr. President, is the whole case. I shall not speak so much about the other components of the Army that are brought in under the pending joint resolution. I am not so much concerned with them, although the same question, of course, arises with regard to all other members and units in all the Reserve components of the Army of the United States as that which arises in the case of the National Guard.

As a matter of fact, the National Guard man may enlist for 3 years; as a matter of fact, he cannot resign unless his resignation be accepted for cause, as the distinguished chairman of the committee now advises the Senate. As a matter of fact, he cannot quit the service; as a matter of fact, he has not any choice about it, even before the enactment of this joint resolution, if it shall be enacted, unless the reason for his action is submitted to the Governor of his State and the Governor approves the grounds upon which he asks for his discharge. Those grounds are well known. There may not be great rigidity in the office of the Governors of the several States in passing upon such applications, but the members of the National Guard have not the option to resign.

Mr. President, I think the members of the National Guard will not resign. I thoroughly agree with the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] in his very able and scholarly statement upon this subject today. Of course, the American soldier, the National Guard man, who is purely a volunteer and has all the elements of the volunteer soldier who has made American arms illustrious in our whole history, is not going to resign in the face of danger or in the face of a threat to the peace and security of his country. That is true. I do not think for a moment that the members of the National Guard will avail themselves of this opportunity to resign unless they have reasonable cause to resign.

But, Mr. President, if the Senate is mindful of the circumstances under which we are proceeding and of the very extraordinary step that we are now taking, it must know that members of the National Guard who went up to their respective county seats or to their State capitals and volunteered as guardsmen thought they were volunteering to defend their country. They never dreamed that, aside from a state of war which would be declared not by the Army's Chief of Staff, not by the General Staff, not by the President of the United States, but by the Congress of the United States for whom they were privileged to vote, they could be sent outside their respective States.

They became members of the National Guard upon that undoubted understanding of the law of the land; they became members of the National Guard with that unquestioned understanding; they became National Guard men because they wanted to protect the interests of their respective States.

We are all familiar with the fact that by a circuitous method the National Guard is now given the dual character of an organized State militia and of a national organization. I do not care to discuss that, but the National Guard in every State was organized, was continued, and the latest enlistments were made, upon the definite understanding and the law that they were members of a State militia. They might be called, it is true, into the service of the country in time of war, but who has the right to declare it? Only the Congress of the United States may rightfully declare it. But I warn this country now that we may become participants in a war without a declaration of war. The joint resolution now before the Senate provides, in express terms, that the National Guard may be called into active military service, not for training; the very suggestion that they are called for training is hypocrisy of the plainest character and type. They are to be called for active military service. Is there a Member of the Senate who does not recall that in the days of President Polk the Army of the United States was sent outside the United States, clearly beyond the boundaries of Texas, and in a position of advanced danger? When that Army was assailed, the cry arose all over the Nation, "We are, for all intents and purposes, in war; we must defend ourselves." Then it was that a statesman stood on the floor of the Senate, John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, and in a memorable speech, then unassailed and yet unassailable, declared that if we must make war upon Mexico it was not necessary that we make war upon the American Constitution in the same breath.

The pending joint resolution provides that the National Guard, enrolled for the enforcement primarily of the law and for the preservation of the peace within the States, with no thought that it would be called as a part of the armed forces of the United States save in war, may now be sent—where, Mr. President? Under the plain language of the measure, to any part of the Western Hemisphere but not outside the Western Hemisphere—God save the mark! Not outside the Western Hemisphere? It may be sent to the possessions of the United States and to the Philippine Islands in the very doorway of a conflagration which has arisen in the east. Can we not give them the opportunity to step out of the guard if they want to? That is all the pending amendment provides. It does not leave it optional to any Governor, and I am happy that it does not do so. It does not leave it optional to any Governor who may be under great obligations to Washington.

The hour has come when men should speak plainly. The amendment leaves it to the discretion of nobody; the amendment is perfectly plain; and Senators should want to go on record; they should want to face the issue. It is a plain amendment. It provides that the members of the National Guard and other Reserve components of the Army may not be called into the Federal service under existing law save in war; and by that is meant a declared war by the Congress of the United States.

Senators will remember that there was another occasion when the armed forces of this Nation, under a great man who loved peace—though he finally led the country, or else the country led him, into the Great War—were sent into a Mexican port, where the lurid flame of American cannon was seen. But the great President Woodrow Wilson lost no time in asking for a ratification of the things he had done in sending the armed forces into the Mexican port, and the Congress ratified his action.

What are we asked to do? We are asked to lift the National Guard of our States into the Army of the United States—for training? No; for active service anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, in Mexico, in Brazil, in the Argentine, anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, in Canada, anywhere, and anywhere outside of the Western Hemisphere if it is still within the territory of the United States.

What does a party declaration mean when it says "We are against war; we will not send American men to fight in the battles of any other nation beyond the seas," when here, before the ink is dry upon that platform, we are asked to send the guard, without opportunity of its members to give assent—men who have enlisted in their local communities largely for the protection of local interests, the old idea of the militia—into the Army of the United States, and anywhere in the Western Hemisphere?

Senators may vote for such a measure if they wish to, but they will answer questions when they go home. All America has not lost its common sense. Men and women in humble walks of life still have some sanity left. They will ask questions that we cannot answer if we vote against this amendment. All this amendment does is to say, "Now, since we are doing this extraordinary thing, you have a right to resign if you wish to do so, and neither your Government nor anybody else can prevent you from offering your resignation." The President of the United States cannot say to the man who has an honorable record of service and has been retired that he shall be brought back into the active service, even in peacetime, if this amendment becomes a part of the joint resolution. It is a very simple proposition. Why should we not adopt it?

You and I know that there are many men in the National Guard, there are many men in the Reserves, there are many men in all the component units who are uncertain about the course they should pursue even in their personal and their business relationships. They do not know. If we pass this measure as it stands, they have no option of making it final and settling it. They may be called; they may not be called. As the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] has so ably pointed out, they must sit there; they must wait there. They cannot arrange their personal affairs; they cannot outline their business program and follow it up consistently. "We do not know whether or not we will be called. If we were certain we would be called, we would be glad to serve, but we may not be called." When it is positively certain that not all of them will be called, not half of them will be called, I dare say not 10 percent of them will be called, why not say to them, "If you want to settle that uncertainty, you may do so. You came into the service under other conditions. You are not obligated to remain in the service when conditions have so vastly changed. There is no reflection upon you if you want to make certain your course, your business relationships; if you want to act intelligently in laying out your farm for another year, or in following and pursuing your ordinary vocation for another year." Why not say to them, "You may step out of this organization if you want to do so"?

Not many of them will do it, but those who are under an imperative necessity probably will. At least, it will give all of them the opportunity, and those who remain will occupy the status of volunteers. They will occupy the position that the American soldier always wants to occupy, a position he himself has chosen and taken in obedience to the demands or the necessities or the needs of his country, not under a measure like this.

Mr. President, that is all this amendment is. It simply takes the situation as it exists, and offers to those who are now in the National Guard—or in other components of the Army—the opportunity within 20 days of saying to the Government, "I elect to resign from this organization." If they are within the draft age, and we subsequently pass a draft act, they will be caught, anyway; but that is not the consideration which will appeal to them. They will not resign unless there is a reason for resigning; but if there is a reason for resigning the Senate ought to be willing to say, "You may do it without the slightest stain or reflection upon your character, without the slightest question regarding your patriotism and your desire to serve your country."

Mr. President, it seems to me that this simple amendment assumes a tremendous degree of importance when it is considered that Congress is now doing almost blindly the most extraordinary thing that was ever seriously contemplated in the whole history of this Nation; to wit, covering the militia, the home guard, the State forces, into the National Army, not for the purpose of training—I have heard that statement made so often that I can hardly respectfully repeat it—but for the purpose of making them a part of the national-defense forces and sending them anywhere, so long as they are kept in the Western Hemisphere or in the possessions of the United States or in the Philippine Islands, sending them into a position of advanced danger. Who cares? Is it your responsibility as a Member of the Congress, or is it General Marshall's responsibility as the Chief of Staff? Is it your responsibility and mine as Members of the Senate, or is it the responsibility of some officer of the United States Army, or of the executive branch of the Government, if you please? Their duties are different. They are not similar to ours. The Congress of the United States, and the Congress alone, has the power to declare war, has the power to do this extraordinary thing, has the power to create a condition from which there can be no retreat, and from which we must steadily advance to war as America advanced to war during the Presidency of Polk, when American soldiers were sent outside of the United States.

The strange doctrine has arisen in this country that we must send our soldiers outside to take up a defensive position for the United States. Mr. President, there is no logic or reason in that position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Georgia on the amendment has expired.

Mr. GEORGE. I will take just a minute or so on the joint resolution.

I do not care who lays down the premise that we must advance to some point outside of the United States to take up a defensive position for this Nation. I know the military experts may say that the best defense is an offense, and that if we go out soon enough to stop the other fellow he cannot ever get to us. That is the doctrine of militarism, that is the doctrine of tyranny, that is the doctrine of dictatorships. That is not the doctrine of democracy; it is not now, it never has been.

The doctrine of a free people is that we will defend our own land against invasion; that we will listen to the siren voice and song of no military leadership which tells us that the best way to defend our country is to go over on the Rhine, or to take up a defensive position just outside of London, or anywhere else in the British Empire. That is the doctrine of militarism. That is not the doctrine of a free people. That is not the basis on which we have acted.

When those who framed the American Constitution talked about the militia to be used to enforce the laws of the Nation, to repel invasion, to suppress insurrection, they meant invasion of America. Once commit yourselves to the doctrine that you will meet the invader somewhere outside of the Nation and you have subscribed to the doctrine that you will meet the invader anywhere, anywhere the Army may lead or anywhere some ambitious man in power may choose to draw the battle line. That is not the doctrine of America. That is not the doctrine of a free people.

Mr. President, we have a free Constitution. It is written in the simplest language possible. It is written in understandable language. It is as plain as the nose upon the face of the average man, and anyone can follow it if he desires. The Constitution was written for a free people, was written to preserve the liberties of the individual, was written to protect us against the insidious wiles which spring out of the doctrines which always have been invoked by arbitrary governments, of whatever form. They have proceeded to interpret the character of a free people by invoking the doctrine of those enslaved to arbitrary government. Every member of the guard enlisted, if not with an actual knowledge which he could defend in a town meeting, at least with a consciousness in his American soul that he was enlisting primarily and exclusively for the defense of his home, his State, unless his country—that is to say, his Congress, for whom he is yet privileged to vote—should declare that a state of war existed between our Nation and some other nation and the President should call him into the military service of the Nation.

I do not in the slightest reflect on the patriotism of a single member of the National Guard, from Maine to Florida, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but hundreds and thousands of them, as a solemn duty to home and to children and to wives, may properly exercise that right and that privilege, and I want to give it to them without making them the obedient servants of the Governor of some State who may say, "I am surprised that you have handed me your resignation. You should withdraw it. You should apologize for ever having thought of resigning."

The whole purport of the amendment is that those who have come into service under the conditions which I have enumerated may voluntarily, if they wish, exercise their privilege of resigning within 20 days, and no one can say nay to them. I do not see why the Senate should not be willing to vote to that end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER]. On that amendment the "yeas" and "nays" have been ordered.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the major premise of the argument of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] is entirely in accord with my views, but I do not reach the same conclusion. The reserve forces of the United States and the National Guard were established for the purpose of providing protection to the United States and to the States, under the conditions provided in the Constitution. If we are to permit the members of the guard and the members of the Reserve to resign whenever there is a threat to call them out, we are leaning upon a very weak support.

The argument for the amendment is that the Senate of the United States and the Congress propose to disregard the Constitution and call out the militia and the Reserves under conditions which are not authorized by the Constitution. It seems to me that the thing for the Senate to do is to comply with the Constitution, and not be forced to say to the members of the guard or the Reserve, "We are going to exact of you a service which you did not contemplate when you entered the service." It seems to me we should not pass a measure which goes beyond the Constitution. Then there would be no occasion to say to the members of the guard, "You are going to be called out into a service you did not contemplate; therefore we will permit you to withdraw from the service." We would put a member of the guard in an embarrassing position if we were to say to him, "You can resign if you do not want to go." He has a perfect moral right to resign, but he will not resign, and we are doing an injustice to the members of the guard if we trespass upon the contract which they have made.

The Constitution of the United States very plainly provides the circumstances and conditions under which the members of the guard may be called into service. They may be called into service by the Congress to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrection, or to repel invasion. Under the proposed law we are not planning to call them out to enforce the laws, to suppress insurrection, or to repel invasion. As was pointed out by the able Senator from Georgia, we are seeking to call the guard to the colors for foreign service. We propose to say to them, "You shall become a part of the Army of the United States, subject to the direction and control of the Commander in Chief. If he sees fit to send you to Jamaica, an English colony, he can do so. If he wishes to send you to Martinique, a French colony, he may do so. If he wishes to send you to Patagonia, he may do so." And that is based upon what? Upon the uncertain term "Western Hemisphere."

A distinguished Senator stated yesterday that I was a purist because of my attempt to hold the term hemisphere to what it plainly means, one-half of the globe. That is what hemisphere means, and Western Hemisphere means the western half, from wherever one may begin. I say that once we take 180 degrees from any point, we take half the globe. If it is desired to include Iceland, as some do, a part of Africa is included, and New Zealand and thousands of islands in the South Seas, as well as a part of Siberia. To any of those places, under this measure as it stands, the National Guard can be sent.

There is at the desk an amendment, which I expect to call up following action on the pending amendment, which will restrict the use of the American Reserves to the continental United States and its possessions and territories. I do not believe that the Congress wishes to abdicate the power vested in it to make and declare war. If we vest in the Commander in Chief of the Armies of the United States the power to send the armed forces of the United States into foreign territory, we are vesting in him the power to declare war—nothing less than that. If the armed forces are sent into foreign territory, that is the equivalent of war, either for or against the country into whose territory they are sent.

It seems to me that the Congress should retain its authority, and consequently, largely because of the reasons presented by the Senator from Georgia as to the unconstitutional character of the authority sought to be granted, I am unwilling to assume that the Congress will exact of the soldier an obligation which he did not undertake.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to say that the Senator from Georgia has made a very novel argument. He tells us in effect that he realizes the amendment will be a dead letter—that in all probability no National Guardsman will resign. Yet as an expression of disgust with this resolution he wants us to adopt the amendment. At least that is the way his argument impresses me.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. It ought to be stated and understood that the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut does not simply apply to members of the National Guard. It applies to every Reserve officer in the United States. It applies to every boy who has graduated at Kelly Field, in Texas, in the Air Corps, and who is now on the Reserve. Under this amendment he can resign in 20 days, and the President is obliged to accept his resignation. As I said awhile ago, the amendment will compel a discharge to be granted within 20 days to everyone who wants it in the National Guard and the Reserve Corps or any of the branches of our military service.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is very true, Mr. President.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Of course, it would defeat or make possible the defeat of the purpose the Congress has had in mind ever since 1920, in line with which it has appropriated millions and hundreds of millions of dollars to train and prepare and to equip the National Guard, and to train and prepare the officers of the Reserve. Is that not true?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is.

Mr. HILL. The very reason for spending millions of dollars to develop the Officers' Reserve Corps, is that these men may be available to the country if the country needs their service. Is that not true?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Quite true. Let no Senator imagine for a moment that we are attempting to deal with the militia of the States as such. We are dealing with bodies of militia who are made members of the Army of the United States by law of Congress.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I wanted to bring out this point for the information of the Senate, that there will not be one single man subject to order under this measure, who has not taken a separate oath, an oath separate from any oath that he has taken as a member of the National Guard of a State, this separate oath being an oath of allegiance and loyalty to the Federal Government, recognizing that he is subject to call for service by the Federal Government.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is correct, Mr. President. And the President of the United States, in his message requesting this proposed legislation, said:

The National Guard of the United States, an integral and vital part of the Army, comprises a body of men who have voluntarily assumed an obligation to serve the Nation in any crisis.

I wish to read a law enacted by Congress in June 1916:

The Militia of the United States—

Permit me to interject that this law creates the Militia of the United States—

The Militia of the United States shall consist of all able-bodied male citizens of the United States and all other able-bodied males who have or shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, who shall be more than 18 years of age and, except as hereinafter provided, not more than 45 years of age, and said militia shall be divided into three classes, the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and the Unorganized Militia.

Since that time the clause "the naval militia" has been stricken.

Then, Mr. President, in another section of that National Defense Act of 1916 it is provided:

That the Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard of the United States, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Organized Reserves, and the Enlisted Reserve Corps.

Thus the National Guard is made a vital part of the Army of the United States and is subject to the same duties and responsibilities as the Regular Army of the United States, and the National Guard man welcomes that conception of the law. The National Guard man wants no limitation placed upon his services. He wants to stand by the side of the soldier in the Regular Army on a basis of equality and respond to any call of duty that may be imposed upon the soldier of the Regular Army.

Again, Mr. President, the authority in clause 15, article 8, of the Constitution, to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the United States, suppress insurrections and repel invasions is not the only authority in connection with this matter in the Constitution. In the next clause, clause 16, article 8, of the Constitution, Congress is given power—

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the appointment of the officers—

And so forth. Every National Guard man who takes the oath takes it with the understanding that he is a part of the Regular Army and subject to the same obligations that may be imposed upon the Regular Army.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask particularly the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], whose amendment is under discussion. I understand that the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] is shortly to offer an amendment to the pending measure, under the terms of which National Guard men may be sent only to the islands in the Caribbean and to our own Territories and insular possessions. If the amendment which the Senator from Colorado expects to offer were to be accepted, would not the Senator from Connecticut consider withdrawing his amendment?

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. If I understand the Senator from North Carolina to be propounding a question, certainly the answer to it is "No."

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thought, perhaps, in view of the fact that the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Colorado would permit, under the measure, authority only to the extent of sending National Guard men to our Territories and insular possessions——

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield further?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. DANAHER. There is a question of principle involved, let me say to the Senator from North Carolina, and if the Senator will refer to page 1 of the measure he will discover in line 9 that those who constitute the component Reserves are to be called out with or without their consent, when it was the understanding at the time they enlisted or accepted assignment under existing law that they were not to be called out unless the Congress of the United States declared an emergency to exist.

If the Senator from North Carolina will examine the act of June 4, 1920, he will find that—

The President is hereby authorized to order annually, with their consent, the officers of the Reserve Corps into annual training.

He will find with reference to the National Guard that the act provides specifically that, with their consent, the National Guard officers may be ordered into training. But in this case not only are these officers not being ordered into training at all but they are being ordered against their consent into the active military service of the United States, as the Senator from Colorado has pointed out, anywhere from Tierra del Fuego to the North Pole.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thought that perhaps the Senator likewise was taking into consideration the fact that many, no doubt, would object to being sent outside our Territories and our insular possessions.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to ask the judgment of the Senator as to whether or not the amendment which I propose to present ought to be offered in its logical order ahead of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. The Senator from Connecticut has two major objections, one of which, the extraterritorial use of our troops, would be covered by my amendment. The other is the authorization to call out the troops when there is no insurrection or invasion. If the Senate, in its august wisdom, should decline to limit the calling out of troops as provided by my amendment, I should vote for the Senator's amendment; but I cannot vote for it in the uncertainty as to what the Senate may do.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I wonder if the Senator from Connecticut will consider deferring consideration of his amendment until after we have passed upon the amendment which is to be offered by the senior Senator from Colorado.

Mr. DANAHER. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that at this time I will not agree to defer the position of the pending amendment. Had this particular request been propounded 24 hours ago, I most certainly would have been glad to yield its position. The fact remains that if the view of the Senator from Colorado, as advanced by him in his previous arguments, should prevail, as a matter of conviction and principle he necessarily would vote against the bill whether or not his amendment should prevail. That is not the point at issue with me. I feel that the pending amendment has been so thoroughly argued in its present order that it should not be displaced.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I am entirely in favor of sending men out of this country; I am 100 percent in favor of sending men to foreign lands; I insist that we send men from this country to foreign countries; but the men of whom I speak are aliens who are now here. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MEAD in the chair). The Chair admonishes the occupants of the galleries that the rules of the Senate forbid demonstrations on their part. Such demonstrations are a violation of the rules of the Senate and may cause the Chair to order the galleries to be cleared. The Chair asks the occupants of the galleries, as guests of the Senate, to remain in order.

The Senator from North Carolina may proceed.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have in mind particularly one Harry Bridges. We are spending money hand over fist. We have authorized and appropriated approximately $18,000,000,000. We are contemplating conscripting 2,000,000 men for the purpose of preparing to resist Hitler or anyone else who might have the nerve to come over here and attempt to lick us. We have billions of dollars to spend.

However, Mr. President, the appalling thing to me is that with all our wealth and all our money we cannot lick one man. That one man is Harry Bridges. He has licked us. I am ashamed to make that statement to the American people, but, unfortunately, it is true. He is one of the worst enemies this Government ever had. The American people, led by the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and other organizations, have been trying for years to get rid of that enemy within our midst; but despite the influence of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled Veterans of the World War, and every other patriotic organization in the country, and despite our wealth, Harry Bridges has licked us. He is still here. However, the American people are insisting that he get out.

In that connection, I think that the enemies within are much more imminently dangerous and destructive than the enemies without, in fear of whom we have authorized and appropriated billions of dollars. We are daily talking about Hitler coming over here. Who is afraid of Hitler? None of us is. It is true that some persons are afraid of him, which circumstance is attributable to the fact that the American people are hysterical; but I repeat that if Hitler cannot get across the little ditch between the British Isles and continental Europe, he would have a hell of a time crossing 3,000 miles of ocean and coming over here. All we hear about is preparation against somebody who may attack us. We never hear anything about the enemy who is already here, who is raising hell with the foundations of this Government, who is organizing against us, and who eventually will destroy us—and it will not be long.

I shall endeavor to concentrate all my thoughts and most of my time, as I have for the past 8 years in this body, on the destruction of the enemies of our Government who are here. I shall not waste my time and utilize my energy in hating the people of other parts of the world, because they do not care whether we hate them or not.

I think it is time for us to begin to think about the United States. I think it is time for us to begin to think about the 130,000,000 or 135,000,000 people in this country—our friends, our neighbors, American citizens—and let the other people of the world take care of themselves. We hate every nation upon the face of the earth except Great Britain, and Great Britain hates us, so we are in a pretty bad way.

Mr. President, the American people have reached the point where they are demanding that we give some time and attention to them. I am sorry to say that things have reached the point that if a man says something or tries to do something in behalf of his own people and his own country, many persons say that he is pro-Hitler, pro-Japanese, or pro something else. A man cannot be pro-American and be anything else. Things have reached the point that if a preacher rises in his pulpit and sheds tears and prays to God above that we take care of our own little orphans and feed our own starving little children in the United States, some "pro" fellow will say, "That fool evidently does not want us to bring over here all the children from England, Ireland, Scotland, Belgium, and other places."

Mr. President, I wish that my words could reach the ears of every person in America. I wish to say that first I am for the starving children in my State of North Carolina and in the other States of the Union. My sympathies are first with the orphans in my State—and there are thousands of them—for whom we are seeking homes. My heart beats first for the orphans, the unfortunate little boys and girls in every State in the Union whose fathers and mothers are dead. My sympathies are with them first. My sympathies are first with the American people; and, so far as I am concerned, I shall devote all my thought, time, attention, and energy to the interests of the 133,000,000 people in the United States. After we shall have provided for our own orphans and our own homeless, hungry, and starving children; after we shall have provided jobs for our own unemployed; and after we shall have put our own house in order, then those who care to do so may devote their time and attention to the interests of the people of other parts of the world.

Mr. President, the American Legion is interested in getting rid of Harry Bridges, one of millions of aliens in this country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CONNALLY in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KING. First, let me say to the Senator that I think upon reflection he may desire to modify one of the observations which he made a moment ago, and I hope he will forgive me for making the suggestion. I do not believe that the American people hate all the nations of the world. I do not think the American people, by and large, hate any nation. We may feel a great amount of exasperation and anger at some of the tyrants and ruthless dictators in other lands; but, speaking generally, I think the American people are sufficiently animated by the spirit of Christianity to love the world, although regretting evils which exist. The American people regret tyranny wherever it exists, but they do not feel any hatred. I know that we do not have any hatred for Holland, Belgium, Denmark, and other democratic nations, or for China, which is today under the iron heel of a despotic nation. Twenty million Chinese have been killed; 50,000,000 have lost their homes. We feel profound sympathy for them and for the distressed and oppressed generally.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is true. We feel profound sympathy for everybody on God's earth except the people here in the United States.

Mr. KING. I do not agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. REYNOLDS. And I cannot agree with the Senator. I say that we are devoting our time and attention to the people of the world while we ought to be thinking about the people of the United States. We are all upset about children all over the world, while in our own country there are orphans, poverty, hunger, and unemployed. I say we ought to devote our time and energies and concentrate them upon conditions here at home.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I do not think the American people need any defense. I think the most chivalrous, charitable people in the world are the American people.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I do, too, but I want charity to begin at home.

Mr. KING. I think charity is beginning at home. We are spending, perhaps not enough, but millions and tens of millions of dollars annually for the amelioration of the condition of the American people. Perhaps we should spend more, but I am sure that the many charitable organizations in the State of North Carolina and in all the other States call for admiration and commendation. I know—and I speak, I think, for millions of American people—that they are sympathetic with the downtrodden and oppressed. They are sympathetic with those who are underprivileged in the United States.

Mr. REYNOLDS. But we ought to put our sympathies into action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from North Carolina on the amendment has expired.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I will take time on the joint resolution.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly; I am very much obliged to the Senator for his statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield, if the Senator from Utah so desires.

Mr. KING. I do want to defend the American people from any imputation that they entertain hatred for other nations or other peoples.

Mr. REYNOLDS. When the Senator rose I thought he was going to talk about Harry Bridges, because I know the Senator is chairman of the subcommittee that has been designated to consider the bill passed by the other House.

Mr. KING. I thought the Senator would not object to my calling attention to one of his observations which I thought was too sweeping.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Not at all; I am grateful to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Now let me say to the Senator that the committee, of which I am only a member, intends to meet this afternoon to make such disposition as the committee feels proper of the so-called Harry Bridges case. It would have met this morning but for the fact that one Senator was compelled to be in another committee. Upon a number of previous occasions efforts have been made to have a committee meeting, but prior engagements of members of the committee prevented.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am extremely glad to learn that at last we are going to get some action on that case. I know, as a matter of fact, the Senator has inconvenienced himself to come back here from Utah, where he is engaged in a campaign, to look after this, with other important governmental matters, and I am sure the people of his State and the people of the Nation appreciate his action; at least, I hope they do.

I desire to take a little time about this very important matter. I have before me a letter from Col. John Thomas Taylor, director, national legislative committee of the American Legion. I have conferred with Colonel Taylor innumerable times in regard to the all-important matter of deporting this alien enemy, Bridges. A day or two ago I received from him a letter. It is dated Washington, D. C., July 30, sent to me by special delivery, and reads:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., July 30, 1940.

Hon. ROBERT REYNOLDS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR BOB: I am forwarding to you herewith pages clipped from The Saturday Evening Post, issue of July 27, 1940, which carry an article entitled "Madame Secretary," by Benjamin Stolberg, a writer on labor subjects. This article is particularly interesting in a number of phases, and especially that part under the subhead "The Bridges Case." It seems to me this material ought to be very helpful in getting the Bridges bill reported to the Senate.

For instance, Stolberg makes the statement that Bridges' denial that Bridges is a Communist "is a piece of incredible gall." Could not Stolberg be called as a witness by the Senate committee or subcommittee to give whatever information he has on this subject?

Then, there is Stolberg's statement that Harry Lundeberg, secretary of the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, "knows Bridges' record in the Communist Party in great detail." Could not Lundeberg be called as a witness?

I was also interested to read Stolberg's charge that he had asked the Secretary of Labor why a "certain person of undoubted integrity, who had originally inducted Bridges into the Communist Party" was not called as a witness in the Landis hearing. The Secretary of Labor asserted such "certain person" was "being paid by such and such an organization." It seems to me that regardless of who might be paying such a valuable witness, such witness could supply authentic information if he "had originally inducted Bridges into the Communist Party."

Other matters in the article which interested me are, (1) that Dr. Louis Bloch, a member of the United States Maritime Labor Board, is one of Bridges' closest friends"; (2) that "one of the leading fellow travelers in Washington is Merle D. Vincent, director of hearings in the Wage and Hour Division," and that "this gentleman is president of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, which is the direct successor of the League for Peace and Democracy, where Mr. Vincent also has been active"; and (3) and that there is a Communist cell on every boat.

I hope you can make effective use of the enclosed.

Sincerely,

JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR,
Director, National Legislative Committee.

I am very greatful to Col. John Thomas Taylor for having provided me that information and brought to my attention the article in the Saturday Evening Post.

In connection therewith, I desire to bring to the attention of the able chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Immigration of the Senate at the same time a letter which I have today received from Representative LELAND M. FORD, of the First District of California, after which I shall read excerpts from The Saturday Evening Post article. Mr. FORD provided me today, by hand, with a copy of a letter directed to the very able chairman of the Immigration Committee of the Senate [Mr. RUSSELL], who gave immediate attention to the Bridges matter when it was referred to his committee, by appointing a subcommittee to consider it. The letter written by Mr. FORD is as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 2, 1940.

Hon. RICHARD B. RUSSELL,
Chairman, Committee on Immigration,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I understand that the bill providing for the deportation of Harry R. Bridges, now pending before your committee, has been referred to a subcommittee for investigation and report to the full committee.

As you will perhaps recall, I introduced the original bill providing for the deportation of undesirable aliens, and particularly one Harry R. Bridges, whose case was very thoroughly heard before the Immigration and Naturalization Committee of the House on May 8 and 14.

I respectfully request that when the House bill is heard before the Senate Committee on Immigration I be permitted to testify before your committee, as I have in my possession very valuable evidence and data which I should like to present to the Senate Committee.

Thanking you for an immediate response and designation of the date and hour on which I may appear before your committee, I remain

Sincerely yours,

L. M. FORD.

Mr. FORD, although a Representative in Congress from California, is a native of the State of Virginia. He has devoted a great deal of time to this matter in which the American Legion has taken a lead and in which the American people are thoroughly interested. I send to the desk now a copy of House bill 8310 relative to the deportation of undesirable aliens which was introduced by Mr. FORD of California in the House of Representatives on February 5, 1940.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina ask that it be printed or has he read all that he cares to?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I have read the letter in full and I should like to have the bill introduced by Mr. FORD of California printed in the RECORD in order that he may have full credit for his fine work in this particular matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina requests to print certain matter in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill referred to is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any alien shall be deported in the manner hereinafter provided by law who, while in the United States, is, or has been, by his words or acts, sympathetic with, or is, or has been, associated with, or affiliated with, or seeks or has sought the support, or who has used or uses the support of Communists in the United States or elsewhere, whether communistic individuals or communistic organizations, either of domestic or of foreign origin in whole or in part, in the interference with the good order and happiness of any local community, or with the established democratic economic or domestic relations within this Republic, or who has used or uses such communistic individuals or communistic organizations for compelling the adoption of his views, aims, or purposes regarding such domestic or economic relations, or who has heretofore admitted any of the foregoing acts.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I desire now to read from the Saturday Evening Post, issue of June 27, 1940, which was referred to by Colonel Taylor, of the American Legion, who asked me to bring it to the attention of this body. Again I thank him for having brought to my attention the Bridges case.

Miss Perkins is especially proud of the work of the Immigration and Naturalization Service while it was under her jurisdiction.

I might digress there to recall to the Members of this body that during her supervisorship of that Service of the Government she permitted 700 alien criminals to leave this country and then to return to the country, for the reason that that was the only way they could possibly get in under her interpretation of the seventh proviso. But since that time this division has been transferred from the Department of Labor to the Department of Justice.

She feels that under her administration it has dealt with aliens as humanely as the law permits.

I will admit that, certainly.

And that is true. She never used far-fetched technicalities to break up families in deportation cases, and political refugees were never deported to their homeland.

It was very rarely that any of them were ever deported because I remember at one time I investigated more than 3,000 such cases in the Department of Labor.

In cases where deportation was mandatory, the refugee was permitted to choose the country to which he preferred to go. It is a pity that this humanitarian picture has been marred by Miss Perkins' attitude in the deportation cases against Harry Bridges and Joseph Zack, two dramatic public examples of her incapacity to realize the scope and influence of Stalinist "fifth column" activities.

Bridges is the head of the west coast longshoremen and an important C. I. O leader. He is an Australian who has never become a citizen. A great many persons, including Members of Congress, demanded his deportation for alleged Communist activities.

Bridges has consistently denied that he is a member of the Communist Party or even a "fellow traveler." The denial is a piece of incredible gall, for Bridges is known in the labor movment as the leading Communist trade-unionist in the United States, and there is ample evidence to prove it.

Bridges is the key man in all the maritime unions, East and West, and on the Gulf, which are outside the A. F. of L. They are controlled by the Communist Party, lock, stock, and barrel. Recently the Communist Party, or rather the Ogpu, has set up the so-called "Cuban plan," which provides for a Communist cell on every boat. By this arrangement, letters, messages—"directives" of all sorts—can be smuggled to any port, and Ogpu agents stowed away. This network extends throughout the Caribbean and reaches into South America. During the last half year Harry Bridges has spent practically all his time in the East, helping to organize and reorganize powerhouses and warehouses. These are of military importance.

Here is a man working night and day against our Government, which we are trying to preserve; and with all of our wealth and with all of our power we cannot deport him, and the American people want to know why.

Various former members of maritime unions who have broken with the Communists have testified before the Dies Committee and have written books and pamphlets which clarify completely the role of Harry Bridges in the Communist Party. Harry Lundeberg, secretary of the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, knows Bridges' record in the Communist Party in great detail and has constantly published it in the West Coast Sailor.

In short, the idea that Harry Bridges is not a Communist makes as much sense as the idea that Herbert Hoover is not a Republican, or that Norman Thomas is not a Socialist. Miss Perkins has known Bridges' record for some time, for about 2 years ago I myself told her in considerable detail about his activities up to then, all of which she could easily have checked.

Giving in to congressional pressure, she finally allowed a warrant to be issued for the arrest of Harry R. Bridges on March 2, 1938.

She finally allowed that.

She appointed as the trial examiner Dean James M. Landis, of the Harvard Law School. Hearings were opened on July 10, 1939.

Right here I want to digress to inquire why those deportation proceedings were not referred to the Federal judge on the west coast who had been trying deportation proceedings of that sort theretofore. The answer is because Madam Perkins, of the Department of Labor, knew that if Bridges was tried before a Federal judge he would be deported, and so the officials did not send the matter before that Federal judge. They sent it before Dean Landis, believing that he would "whitewash" him, I assert.

They continued for almost 11 weeks. The testimony covers 7,724 pages. Finally, after months of labor, Dean Landis found that "the evidence * * * establishes neither that Harry Bridges is a member of or affiliated with the Communist Party of the United States of America."

Dean Landis may or may not be right in his conclusion from the evidence submitted. The important thing is that the whole so-called trial before Dean Landis was a political whitewash. It was accomplished by a very simple device. The prosecution called as its own witnesses people whose veracity was open to serious doubt on the basis of previous criminal or otherwise unsavory records. Not a single reputable person who has been in the Communist Party with Harry Bridges was subpenaed to testify. No documentary evidence from various Communist publications or from the labor press or other sources, which would have given the picture of the real Bridges case, was presented.

To be sure, several reputable ex-Communists were interviewed by a Department of Labor investigator. None were subpenaed. They were not eager to testify before what they considered an obvious whitewash, partly because they were afraid that they might be framed by the Communist Party. And apparently they were not far wrong. For when I asked Miss Perkins why a certain person of undoubted integrity, who had originally inducted Bridges into the Communist Party, had not been subpenaed to testify, she replied: "Why, don't you know that that person was being paid by such and such an organization?" And she named a Fascist outfit on the west coast. The idea was preposterous. In other words, Miss Perkins unquestioningly accepted the picture handed along to the Department by the professional Stalinist character assassins.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly. I am always delighted to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to ask my friend from North Carolina how long the Bridges deportation bill has been in the Committee on Immigration?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Does the Senator mean in the Congress of the United States?

Mr. CHANDLER. No; in the Senate—since it came from the House, after it passed there.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I imagine it has been here about 30 days; but several bills on the subject have been introduced.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; the question I ask is, How long since the passage of the bill in the House has it been in the committee of the Senate?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I think approximately 30 days.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is the Senator a member of that committee?

Mr. REYNOLDS. No; I am not.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does he consider that the bill has been before the committee an unreasonable time?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Oh, no; I do not.

Mr. CHANDLER. As a practical proposition, if I were the Senator from North Carolina, and thought the bill had been before the committee an unreasonable time, I would give notice that on a day certain I would move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am very grateful to the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to make a practical suggestion, so that we can get a vote not only on this but on other important matters. I think we are wasting a good deal of time on nonessential matters when we should be devoting our time to preparing more adequately for the defense of the country; and we have also expressed a wish to prepare adequately for any eventuality. I do not mean that the Senator from North Carolina is wasting time.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Of course, the Senator from Kentucky realizes, as I do, that we have enemies right here among us who are trying to undermine us, and if we are not careful they are going to undermine us and destroy us before those across the ocean get to us.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to remind my good friend from North Carolina that there was one man in England who for years warned the people of England that they were in danger. There is not anybody in the country today who does not know that the children of England are in danger of being bombed and machine-gunned. I cannot answer the question as to whether or not the children of America will ever be in such danger, but we cannot afford to speculate on it. Therefore, it is important that as speedily as possible we remove enemies such as Harry Bridges, if he is one—and I share the view of the Senator that he is an enemy of the people of the United States of America—and that we immediately prepare adequate defenses here and on the islands outside to meet any eventuality, so that we will not have wasted our time and subjected the children and people of America to the same danger that is confronting those in Britain at this hour.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator immensely for his fine pro-American contribution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from North Carolina on the joint resolution has expired.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senate extend to me the courtesy of permitting the remainder of this article to be printed in the RECORD from the point where I discontinued reading it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the remainder of the article, part of which he has read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The remainder of the article is as follows:

Nobody believes that Gerard D. Reilly, the Solicitor of the Department, or Thomas B. Shoemaker, his assistant, who represented the Government, is either a Communist or a fellow traveler. They merely fell into line. What happened was that some important new dealers, who were Communist fellow tourists, got into the picture and got Miss Perkins to accept it. Among these new dealers was Dr. Louis Bloch, a member of the United States Maritime Labor Board, who is one of Bridges' closest friends, and who has been following the party line for years.

Harry Bridges has not been deported for a very simple reason. Until very recently he has been considered by the New Deal highbrows as one of the great "progressive" leaders of American labor. And Miss Perkins dreaded the thought that she might not seem as "liberal" as the next one. She could not, and she did not dare, rise above the parlor-red New Deal atmosphere which hung over Washington. And what is even more important, she did not dare to offend John L. Lewis and the C. I. O.

After the Landis report Miss Perkins officially canceled the deportation proceedings against Bridges. But she has never lifted the deportation warrant against a man named Joseph Zack, who is out on $500 bail. The Zack case is no less fascinating than the Bridges case. Zack at one time was a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party and a Comintern agent in Colombia, South America. In 1934, he broke with the party.

Zack is the illegitimate child of Czechoslovakian parents. He claims that he was born in Scranton, Pa., in 1893 and that soon after his birth his mother took him to Czechoslovakia, where he spend his childhood and early yourth. He was one of the founders of the American Communist Party, and in 1923 he was arrested at its famous secret meeting in the Michigan woods.

A deportation warrant was issued against him. But later the deportation proceedings were dropped, on the ground that he was a native citizen.

Not long after Zack broke with the Communist Party, two party members reported him to the State Department as having used a false passport on a trip to the Soviet Union. They said that he was an alien, born in Czechoslovakia. Zack presented a notarized statement from his mother, since dead, that he was born in Scranton. The city of Scranton issued to him a birth certificate. The Czechoslovakian consul stated that he would refuse to supply him with a passport, because Prague denied that he was a Czech citizen. It may not be irrelevant to add that as a reaction to his former Stalinist activities, Mr. Zack is today a rabid believer in democracy, a very usual rebound. Yet the Department of Labor has never lifted the deportation warrant against him. He has no friends at court.

On June 14, 1940, the Immigration and Naturalization Service was transferred to the Department of Justice.

Miss Perkins is not a Communist, nor even remotely a Communist sympathizer. She is as true a Democrat in her convictions as I have ever known. But she represents the classic type of soft-minded liberal whom the Stalinists behind the scenes know how to exploit for their own purposes. Completely lacking in political astuteness, she is incapable of recognizing the protean forms and devious nihilism of totalitarian technique or, for that matter, of any oblique strategy.

In the case of Miss Perkins this soft liberalism is complicated by her political fears. The reason she insists, quite unconsciously, upon a sharp distinction between her public and her private life is that the public Miss Perkins and the real Miss Perkins are in permanent conflict.

In the good politician, like Jim Farley, the private person and the public figure are at one. But in the case of Frances Perkins her real self is forever worried about what Mme. Secretary may say or do or even think. With such a sense of insecurity, she obviously cannot ride the winds of doctrine and storms of politics which beat about her ears. No wonder she thinks of the original Perkins homestead as "the only place where I can hide."

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President—

In that elder day, to be a Roman was greater than [to be] a king.

In more modern times, to be a United States Senator was greater than to be either a Roman or a king. But thoughtful persons who read the record of yesterday's proceedings in this Chamber will probably wail with Byron:

Ancient of days! * * * where,
Where are thy men of might? thy grand in soul?
Gone—glimmering through the dream of things that were:
First in the race that led to Glory's goal,
They won, and pass'd away—is this the whole?
A schoolboy's tale, the wonder of an hour!
The warrior's weapon and the sophist's stole
Are sought in vain, and o'er each mouldering tower,
Dim with the mist of years, gray flits the shade of power.

The newspaper-reading public today probably believes dignity rests as lightly upon the shoulders of a United States Senator as it rests upon the shoulders of a circus clown.

The Senate has lost more of its good reputation during the last 2 days than it ever lost in any other entire session during the 16 years that I have had the honor of being a Member of this body.

Manifestly the rules which forbid the imputing of unworthy motives to Senators have been shamefully violated and flagrantly ignored. I deplore the degrading of Senate debate to the low level on which it has raged during the last 30 hours.

I disclaim any intention of criticizing any particular Senator. But, as the chairman of the Committee on Rules, I am charged with some duty to help preserve proper decorum on the floor and promote orderly conduct of the business of what has long been called and should in fact forever be the greatest legislative body in the world.

With malice toward none and such charity for every other Member as I desire for myself, I now give notice, in the most unoffensive but most unequivocal language at my command, that I shall, in the future, make a point of order against any violation of the rule which is designed to prevent Senate debate from becoming as unseemly as a barroom brawl.

Henceforth let us scrupulously endeavor to regain at least a part of the priceless asset we have just lost. Let us so conduct ourselves that the public will respect the United States Senate; so that United States Senators can respect themselves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], upon which the yeas and nays have already been ordered.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum. I do not desire to make the point of no quorum if there is anyone else who desires to speak on the amendment.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. I rose to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then the suggestion is unanimous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Downey	Lodge	Schwartz
Andrews	Frazier	Lucas	Schwellenbach
Ashurst	George	Lundeen	Sheppard
Austin	Gerry	McCarran	Shipstead
Bailey	Gibson	McKellar	Slattery
Bankhead	Gillette	McNary	Smathers
Barbour	Green	Maloney	Stewart

Connally	Johnson, Colo.	Radcliffe	White
Danaher	King	Reed	Wiley
Davis	La Follette	Reynolds
Donahey	Lee	Russell

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, after line 17, it is proposed to add a new subsection, to read:

(f) Any person now subject to the provisions of section 1 may resign his status within 20 days after the approval of this joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am not informed as to how he would vote if present. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], are unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. HILL. My colleague the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], is absent on important public business.

Mr. FRAZIER. On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. If he were present he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—36

Andrews	Donahey	McNary	Thomas, Idaho

So Mr. DANAHER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, there is on the desk an amendment which I now offer and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the remainder of section 1 beginning with words "the Western Hemisphere" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "continental United States and Territories and possessions of the United States."

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the amendment is very simple. My explanation will be very short. As the measure stands, section 1 in substance authorizes—while it is put in a negative form—the sending of those who are to be brought into the national service to any point within the Western Hemisphere. The amendment which I have offered proposes to limit the service of the men who come into the Federal service under this legislation to service in continental United States and the Territories and possessions of the United States. In other words, the service of a National Guard man who enlisted as a National Guard man, primarily as a State soldier, and of the Reserve officer who entered the service as a United States soldier, shall be limited to service upon lands under the flag of the United States; that is, that the Congress should not authorize the Executive of the United States or any Army officer to send National Guard men into any country which is not under the jurisdiction of the United States. It seems to me that unless we wish to abdicate the power and authority of the Congress to declare war, we must make this limitation. If the President of the United States, or the Chief of Staff, or some commanding officer can transport an armed force onto foreign soil, that very act may be an act of war.

The Constitution gives the power to declare war to the Congress. We should not delegate to any official to do that which is the equivalent of an act of war. Certainly it ought not to be our intention to bring the militia of the several States into the Federal service and send them to Patagonia, or New Zealand, or Greenland, or Bermuda.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to put a hypothetical case to the Senator from Colorado. Suppose some foreign government were to establish temporarily air bases in Newfoundland, New Brunswick, or Nova Scotia, at a time when Congress was not in session, and from that point proceeded to bomb Boston and New York and other cities in the northeastern corner of the United States? Mind you, I do not think that is likely, but I think we must prepare for the worst. In such a case would not the amendment of the Senator from Colorado seriously embarrass the protection of the people in the area affected?

Mr. ADAMS. It depends on the Senator's view of the Constitution, and whether the Senator believes that war should not be declared except by Congress. Congress can be assembled within 2 or 3 days at the outside in case of an emergency, and if it sees fit to declare war it can declare war. On the other hand, if Congress as a body did not wish to declare war, we should not leave in the hands of the Executive the power to make war. In other words, the whole problem is as to the purpose of the Congress. Do we wish to put into the hands of a single man the right to involve the United States in war?

Mr. LODGE. Does not the Executive now have the right to send the Navy and the Marines to Nova Scotia, or Newfoundland, or New Brunswick, if he wants to?

Mr. ADAMS. The Navy goes on the high seas, and it goes into harbors, but the question of sending an armed force upon land under the flag of another nation is a very different one.

Mr. LODGE. But if we send Marines we send them under the flag, and that is just as much a warlike act.

Mr. ADAMS. There are some of those who do not enthuse very much about sending the Marines to other countries.

Mr. LODGE. I do not enthuse about sending the Marines to other countries either, but the point I am trying to make is that the Executive, if he wants to get us into war, can do so.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, a very simple question is presented. We are providing for calling out the Reserves. The Reserves are made up in the main of the militia of the several States, the militia being primarily the home guard of the States, organized under State law. It is now proposed to take them from the command of the Governors. Their officers are appointed by State authority. Their training under the Constitution is under State authority, subject to the discipline prescribed by Congress. If Senators desire to go beyond that and say to the President, or to the Chief of Staff, "You may take the National Guard of the State and send it to any place in the Western Hemisphere," they should vote against my amendment. If they want to place some limitation, so that the home guard shall only be used under the American flag, Senators should sustain the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator's amendment should be adopted, and the Congress later, under any circumstances which might seem justifiable, were to declare war, would it not be necessary, in connection with any legislation authorizing the armed forces of the United States to be used in the prosecution of the war, to repeal the provision which the Senator seeks to insert in the pending measure, before the President could use these component forces for the purpose of offense or defense outside continental United States?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes, in one sense; and yet when Congress declares war, Congress by that very act places the war power into the hands of the President—a power that he does not have until the Congress acts, a power that he should not have until the Congress acts.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true that every man who has joined the National Guard since 1916, when the National Defense Act was passed, has done so knowing that he has joined an organization which is a part of the Army of the United States?

Mr. ADAMS. I think not.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is true in a general sense, though perhaps not technically that he joined an organization with notice that it may be called into service by the Government of the United States, and is it not designated in the law as a part of the armed forces?

Mr. ADAMS. Not in the paramount law. The paramount law, which governs all of us, is the Constitution of the United States, and we cannot modify that by passing statutes. That is apparently what was attempted to be done

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. The National Guard does not become a part of the armed forces of the United States until it is called into active service, and it cannot be called into active service until a war is declared by the Congress, or unless the Congress declares some other extraordinary emergency to exist.

The first question asked by the Senator from Kentucky was, "If the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Colorado should be adopted, and subsequently the Congress should declare war, would we not be obliged to repeal the amendment of the Senator from Colorado?" It seems to me that the answer is so obviously "No" that it ought not to trouble anyone, because if war were declared by the Congress, of course every arm of the Army and Navy would enter the war, and be subject to go wherever the exigencies made it necessary for those in command to send it and direct it. So that if this amendment should be adopted, and subsequently war should be declared, of course nothing whatever would have to be done with respect to the amendment which the Senator from Colorado is now offering.

With respect to the contention about every man enlisting in the National Guard knowing that he might be called into the Federal service, in point of law and in point of fact the statement is entirely without any foundation, because, on the contrary, he enlisted with the positive knowledge that, under the law, he would not be called into service unless war were declared by Congress. The act itself so declares—except when an extraordinary emergency is declared by the Congress.

Mr. ADAMS. The only power the Congress has under the Constitution is to call the militia out to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, or repel invasions, no one of which occasions exists.

Mr. GEORGE. I was not willing to have the statement which has been made remain unchallenged in the RECORD. I can well sympathize with the great impatience of the Chief of Staff of the Army, who says that the Congress of the United States is the bottleneck which is holding up the defense program. The Senate of the United States has a responsibility. If it wishes to delegate it to somebody else, all well and good; but, so far as I am concerned as a Member of the Senate, I do not share that sentiment or that spirit. I think the Senate should do its duty. So far as concerns the contention that the members of the National Guard enlisted with the understanding that they might be sent out of the country under a measure such as this, I dare say that no Member of the Senate ever so understood until the joint resolution was proposed.

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the Senator that I do not think Congress may delegate the authority; and if it could delegate it, I do not think it ought to delegate it.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is mistaken about that. Congress seems to be in that humor.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator does not mean to say——

Mr. GEORGE. Within the past 30 to 60 days I have seen the Senate of the United States refuse to allow the boys in the C. C. C. camps to have voluntary military training; and today I see the same Senate proposing to send the National Guard anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, without giving the men the opportunity of saying, "We now elect, under the law, to say whether or not we shall remain as members of the National Guard."

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. OVERTON. The Constitution vests in Congress the authority to raise armies. In the exercise of that authority the Congress of the United States may, by legislation, proceed to raise armies in any manner it sees fit. There is no limit on the authority of the Congress of the United States to raise armies. It may draft into the service men between the ages of 21 and 31, as contemplated in the selective-service bill which has been reported, or it may muster into service all the National Guard. It may muster into service all the lawyers in the United States. It may muster into service only women, if it so desires. There is absolutely no abridgment on the authority of the Congress of the United States to raise armies in any manner in which it desires to do so, either in peacetime or in time of war.

Mr. ADAMS. There is, however, a limitation on the power of Congress to call the militia of the States into service.

Mr. OVERTON. As a militia.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. OVERTON. That is true.

Mr. ADAMS. That is what we are dealing with. We are now dealing with the question of calling into the service the State militia; and there is a specific provision as to how it may be done. There is a limitation as to conditions, a specification as to its training, and a specification as to how the officers shall be appointed. I grant that Congress has full power to form armies; but Congress does not have full and unlimited power over the State militia. Congress may act only in accordance with the Constitution.

Mr. OVERTON. The Congress, by the pending joint resolution, is seeking to call out the militia, not as a militia. It is drafting the military force of the United States, known as the militia; and certain component parts of the Organized Reserves constitute a part of the active military force of the United States. Congress may do so without being guilty of any unjust discrimination. It may draft, muster into the service, and designate as part of the Army the militia and the Organized Reserves.

Mr. ADAMS. Without any compliance with the Constitution?

Mr. OVERTON. Under its authority to raise armies.

Mr. ADAMS. Of course, the Senator and I are going down different paths.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I wish to observe that according to the only atlas available to me, the term "Western Hemisphere" includes not only New Zealand, to which the Senator from Colorado has referred, but also includes all of Polynesia and also a portion of Siberia.

Mr. ADAMS. And a portion of Africa, if we wish to be liberal.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes. I am wondering whether or not it was the intention to extend the operations of the National Guard that far?

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the Senator from Michigan—and this is the last thing I shall have to say—that I cannot comprehend the Congress of the United States being willing to entrust to anybody the power to send outside the domain presided over by the Congress and the President boys who enlisted in the National Guard from patriotic motives, motives of State loyalty and State protection.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I ask the Senator to yield to me because I seek information. Does any restriction such as the Senator from Colorado now proposes with respect to the men in the National Guard apply to members of the Regular Army, the Navy, or the Marine Corps?

Mr. ADAMS. I know of no such provision in the law. We are drafting a new law in reference to carrying these particular men into service, and we are putting into the law as it stands authority to take them anywhere in the Western Hemisphere. I think it is fairly open to implication that in peacetime the Regular Army may not be sent out of the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator says there is no provision in the law prohibiting that course of conduct.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator has many times decided on the bench that the Federal Government is a Government of granted powers, and that the grant must be found within the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Colorado on the amendment has expired.

Mr. ADAMS. I shall take time on the joint resolution.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator will further yield, the point I wish to make is this: The Senator from Colorado has based his argument, at least in part, upon the point that the President might send this group of men anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, and that to protect against that situation, as I understand the Senator's argument, we should write the proposed restriction into the joint resolution. If he is correct about that, I derive no comfort from the amendment, because a President who would send National Guard troops into Siberia, Africa, or South America would not hesitate to send the Regular Army and all the naval forces. I point out that argument merely to show the Senator that if that is the fear, his amendment will not accomplish anything.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the Senator be good enough to suggest a limitation which would be perfectly clear? I shall be very glad to include the Regular Army.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. GILLETTE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not hear the reading of the amendment. Does the Senator's amendment begin to strike out, in line 5, with the words "Western Hemisphere"?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes. The words "Western Hemisphere" are taken out. The provision would then read:

> That the members and units of the Reserve components of the Army of the United States ordered into active Federal service under this authority shall not be employed beyond the limits of continental United States and Territories and possessions of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. GILLETTE. As I indicated yesterday, I am strongly in favor of the Senator's proposal and its purpose. However, I wonder if the Senator has explored this contingency: The present law permits the President of the United States, when Congress shall have declared an emergency to exist, to order into the service the National Guard of the United States, without any limitation. The amendment which the Senator proposes authorizes the President, until 1942, without such declaration of emergency, under the provisions of the joint resolution to order the National Guard into the active service, limiting it to certain territory. The joint resolution provides, in section 4, that—

> All laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby suspended to the extent that they may be in conflict with any provision hereof.

My question is, Has the Senator explored the possible effect on the present law of the adoption of his amendment? Would it suspend the present law, which, if Congress should declare an emergency during the 2 years, would permit the employment of the National Guard in territory other than that to which he proposes to limit it?

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the Senator that I have not made any thorough exploration. I was trying to improve the particular measure pending before us, which not only leaves the matter wide open and unrestrained, but suggests that the troops may be used anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, and to confine the use of the forces drawn into service under the provisions of the joint resolution within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. BROWN and Mr. DANAHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN. I note that the Senator, in phrasing his amendment, includes a portion of the language in lines 6 and 7 on page 2, "Territories and possessions of the United States," but does not include the phrase "including the Philippine Islands." Does the Senator intend, by his amendment, to exclude the Philippine Islands?

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator will realize that the reason why the Philippine Islands are referred to is because the limitation was that they should not be employed beyond the Western Hemisphere except in the possessions of the United States and in the Philippine Islands. In other words, it was an expansion beyond the Western Hemisphere of the power to use the troops. I submit to my friend the question whether or not the term "possessions" includes the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BROWN. There seems to be some doubt about that in the minds of the authors of the measure; but I think it would be very unfortunate if the Congress of the United States should enact legislation which would appear to exclude the Philippine Islands from the protection of any armed forces we have.

Mr. ADAMS. Of course, I think the term "possessions" includes the Philippine Islands. They are subject to the jurisdiction of Congress.

Mr. BROWN. I am willing to vote for the Senator's amendment if he includes in it the term "including the Philippine Islands," and I do not see what harm that can do.

Mr. ADAMS. My understanding is that the term "possessions" includes the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BROWN. Would not the Senator be willing to add those words to his amendment, so as to have no doubt about it?

Mr. ADAMS. I would be perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator ask that the amendment be modified in that way, to clear up the matter?

Mr. ADAMS. I will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator modifies his amendment by including the words "the Philippine Islands."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield at that point, I will state that it is my understanding that the joint resolution as written by the committee used the language "the possessions of the United States, including the Philippine Islands," because there had been an interpretation that the Philippine Islands were technically not a possession of the United States. I agree with the Senator that they certainly ought to be included.

Mr. BROWN. I understand that they are included now—"including the Philippine Islands."

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, in reply to the question propounded by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] to the Senator from Colorado, may I not invite his attention to section 4 of the pending joint resolution, and will he not there find the answer to the question? Let me call to the Senator's attention the fact that it specifically says that—

> All laws and parts of law in conflict herewith are hereby suspended to the extent that they may be in conflict with any provision hereof.

Mr. PEPPER obtained the floor.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. In view of the discussion we have been indulging in about extraterritorial operations of our armed forces, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] if he can answer this question:

What authority existed in the statutes at that time—I am not familiar with the statutory history of that period—for the use of the United States Fleet in an attack on Vera Cruz, Mexico? What authority resided in the Executive to order the fleet to attack a city of a neighboring country?

I seek information on that subject because I think it is vitally important. If there was statutory authority for it, was it specific, or was it merely the authority that resides in the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy?

I hope some Senator can enlighten me, because I think it is important that we know now, as this discussion proceeds, what authority the President has to order our armed forces to go as far as was done at that time. There was no declaration of war, and if the President has such authority it seems to me that if it is broad enough to permit him to order an attack upon a Mexican city and have it shelled, then by the same token he would have authority to order the American Fleet to shell Hamburg, Germany, or to go into the estuary of the Thames and shell London.

I may be wholly in error about the matter, but I should like to have an exposition of that authority now, for the benefit of myself and others who are interested.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, would not the Senator from Texas like to go fully into that matter? If so, will he let me say a word or two, and then yield the floor to him?

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought the Senator from Washington had the floor.

Mr. BONE. No; I asked the question with the permission of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Washington called on the Senator from Texas to answer the question. I assume he referred to my colleague Mr. SHEPPARD.

Mr. BONE. Yes; I did.

Mr. CONNALLY. He is temporarily absent from the Chamber. I do not want a judgment by default, so I want to answer the Senator.

Mr. BONE. I was not aware that the senior Senator from Texas was not in the Chamber until after I started to speak.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I merely want to say a few words. I have good reason to believe—and Senators can verify it—that when our representatives went to Habana recently, to the conference there in which they participated, they saw very clearly the results of propaganda which had been spread in the countries to the south of us in the statement which was presented by representatives of other countries that the United States of America was not able to or capable of defending the Western Hemisphere; that we did not have the necessary Army, that we did not have the necessary Navy, that we were in a state of terrible disorganization, that the sentiment in this country was divided, and that the first argument our representatives had to meet was that the United States was merely putting up a bluff and doing a lot of talking, but was not capable of defending the Western Hemisphere.

I submit to Senators, What could be more injurious to our relationships with those countries now immediately after we have had a successful conference with them and there has been unity and they have agreed to the United States Government in certain cases acting as trustee for the whole hemisphere in the protection of certain territory, than for us in the Senate to pass a measure giving notice to the world that not a single member of our real Reserve Army, when called into active service, could be sent to the defense of any one of those countries if it were attacked? I sincerely submit to Senators that it is contrary to our national interest. It would create lack of confidence in our policy on the part of those countries if we were to adopt such an amendment.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HILL. Taking Panama as an illustration, my understanding is that there is a strip of territory in Panama which the United States owns and which, of course, we must defend, which it is our obligation to defend. A large part of that strip is only 10 miles wide. If we should put this amendment on the joint resolution, no matter how imperative the necessity might be demanding that one of our soldiers cross that strip and go beyond the 10-mile limit, of course, he could not go beyond the 10-mile limit. Is not that correct?

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct.

Mr. HILL. As the Senator says, we are calling this Reserve into the Army of the United States. I do not know what is in the minds of other Senators, but I do know that on the 17th day of June, about 2 months ago, the Senate passed Senate Joint Resolution 271. That was a joint resolution approving nonrecognition of the transfer of any geographic region in the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power. This is what the Senate adopted; this is what the Senate said to the world:

> Whereas many unexpected devlopments are daily arising from the present grave international situation; and
> Whereas such developments are affecting states which have possessions in the Western Hemisphere; and
> Whereas an endeavor to transfer such possessions or any of them from their present owners to any other non-American state would endanger the peace and security not only of this country but of the other American republics.

Then the joint resolution goes on and states that it is—

> Resolved, etc., (1) That the United States would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer any geographic region of the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power.

And yet we are calling out this Reserve of ours which we built up through the years, which the people of the United States have gone into their pockets to pay for. We have spent hundreds of millions of dollars on the Reserve. We are now calling it out, and yet while on June 17 we said that we would not recognize any such transfer, today we say to the world, "Oh, well, we passed that joint resolution, but, so far as the great Reserve of the Army is concerned, we would not think of letting anybody use any part of that Reserve to enforce the very declaration that we uttered." Is not that the position in which we find ourselves?

Mr. ADAMS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator then would go to the extent that if there should be a transfer of coral islands containing 10 acres we should make war?

Mr. HILL. No; the Senator does not go to that extent. The Senator knows, because he is a man of good, common, sound sense, that other people have good, common, sound sense, too, and that no one in the Government would do any such foolish thing as that.

Mr. ADAMS. I hope the Senator is right.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, if the amendment of the Senator should be agreed to, would it not be true that we could not send one member of the Reserve components to uphold the Monroe Doctrine anywhere?

Mr. PEPPER. That is just the point. I hear sentiments expressed on the floor of the Senate which leave me in some doubt as to whether or not we have a Monroe Doctrine. It is time we made up our minds whether we mean to defend the Monroe Doctrine or whether we do not. If we do not, now is a good time to let the world know we do not, and if we do, it is a dangerous time to leave any doubt about it in the mind of anyone in the world.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEWART in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not correct that under the terms of the proposed amendment National Guard men from Florida, or Alabama, or Georgia, or South Carolina, could not go to Cuba in the event of a bombardment, or in the event an attack should be launched in Cuba?

Mr. PEPPER. Of course.

Mr. LODGE. But they would have to go, as they properly should, to repel an invasion on the west coast, for instance. And National Guard men from New England would not be able to fight in defense of their homes in the event of a threat from Canada, but they, too, would have to repel an invasion in some other part of the country?

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator is completely correct about that.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. When the Senator says "completely correct," I want to add a little qualification. What I am trying to do is to maintain in the Congress of the United States the right and the power to say whether or not the forces shall go to Cuba, and not delegate that power to a single man. It is not that we would not go to defend the declaration we are talking about, if it were made by the Congress, but it should be for the Congress to say how far we would go in carrying it out and defending it.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I am wondering whether the point raised by the Senator from Florida does not involve the matter discussed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] a moment ago. If the Monroe Doctrine were violated and outraged, we probably would assume that that would be an act of war against the United States; that is, I assume that reflects the attiude of mind of the Congress of the United States. If it were an act of war, and war were declared, that would eliminate the thing the Senator from Florida suggests, because the armed forces of the United States, regardless of the categories under which they might fall, regardless of their character as State militia, or National Guard men, or Regulars, or Marines, would all automatically go.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I make the point of order that it is impossible to hear what is going on in the Chamber. When the Chair calls for order, for about 2 seconds quiet is maintained, and then it is impossible to hear more than a yard from the speaker.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken, and the Senate will be in order.

Mr. BONE. Resuming, it was my idea—and, frankly, in reaching the conclusion, I agree with the suggestion of the senior Senator from Georgia—that if there were a war—and war might arise out of a violation of the Monroe Doctrine—then the fear expressed by the Senator from Florida would not be valid, because, obviously, then all the segments of the national defense would automatically be called into service and would serve. I think perhaps we have the matter in reverse, because the assumption is we would be fighting without a declaration of war. Certainly if the Monroe Doctrine were involved to a point where we would declare war, the fear expressed by the Senator from Florida would not be valid, because all the soldiers of every category would be in the service. It seems to me that is the conclusion expressed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The able Senator from Florida a moment ago suggested that he ofttimes wondered if we had a Monroe Doctrine. Likewise, I ofttimes wonder if a clear perception of the Monroe Doctrine is in the minds of statesmen. The Monroe Doctrine is a two-way street. The Monroe Doctrine declares that we will not permit European powers to intermeddle with affairs of the New World. It also declares that the United States, while not permitting European powers to intermeddle in cis-Atlantic affairs, will not in any way intermeddle in European affairs. That declaration is one of the important parts of the Monroe Doctrine, although in the minds of some historians, some scholars, and even in the minds of some statesmen, that vitally important part of the Monroe Doctrine seems to have fallen into obsolescence; but it is, nevertheless, one of the essential principles of the Monroe Doctrine.

We should remember that the obligation or proposal to enforce the Monroe Doctrine in the New World carries also an obligation that we will not in any way intermeddle with the concerns of European countries, which means that we are not to send armies to foreign countries if we are to observe the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I appreciate the inquiry by the ever-able and eloquent Senator from Arizona.

There is a course of action, of course, which might be regarded by some as aggression and which could not possibly arise under this measure, because it is not contemplated by anyone that the militia or any other armed forces, certainly the forces involved in the joint resolution, would be sent beyond the Western Hemisphere, or the possessions of the United States, or the Philippines. So, of course, we would not be violating even the Senator's concept of the limitations of the Monroe Doctrine under this particular joint resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has but 20 minutes, and it is not my disposition to impose upon his good nature by asking him to yield, but it seems to me we would save a vast deal of trouble in the future by defining what the term "Western Hemisphere" includes, or else adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

It will be remembered that by the act of Congress of February 28, 1795, during the administration of General Washington, there was delegated to the President the power to call forth the militia, and the act was held constitutional by two decisions of the Supreme Court. Under the act the power to determine when the exigency requiring calling forth the militia was held to be exclusively in the President, and it was held that his determination upon that point was conclusive. So said the Supreme Court.

In view of the fact that the Presidential power and authority is conclusive on this subject, it seems to me that judgment and foresight would require the Congress to declare what is the Western Hemisphere, or adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, in order to save ourselves trouble in the future. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator from Arizona always makes an able contribution to any subject to which he addresses himself.

It seems to me there can be only three questions involved. The first is whether or not the joint resolution as reported by the committee is constitutional. That is a legal question, which I assume the committee of the Senate explored before it reported the measure. They had access to the Attorney General; they had access to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. They could have had able legal advice put at their disposal on this subject, and I assume, I believe fairly, that the committee determined that the joint resolution was constitutional. Therefore I do not propose to go into a debate of the constitutional question in the limited time available.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I apologize for interrupting further, but there is a way in which, by the insertion of a few words, the constitutionality, if it be in doubt—and I do not think it is—could be settled by declaring that there exists a reason, namely, to repel invasion, to enforce the laws, or to suppress rebellion. If that language were inserted there could be no doubt, even in the mind of a wayfarer, as to the constitutionality of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida on the amendment has expired.

Mr. PEPPER. I will take my time on the joint resolution.

The second question is, If this discretion devolves upon the President, if it should be vested in him, whether at this particular time, as a matter of policy, we ought to create the Army of the United States, and have it a mobile and available force, or whether we should simply halfway put this Reserve unit at the disposal of the proper authorities—even the Congress of the United States? In other words, it is a question of whether or not we are to have an Army to defend the United States and the Western Hemisphere that is subject to immediate command of competent authority, that is equipped and ready to go wherever its legal course may require it to go.

If we are to impose conditions precedent upon that, and show a sort of half-hearted determination to have a real, mobile, vital army, it seems to me it will endanger the military security of our country.

The third question is the psychological effect the adoption of the amendment will have upon the Western Hemisphere and those nations which are trying brazenly to get a foothold in the Western Hemisphere.

As I said a moment ago, I have considerable authority to cause me to make the statement that our representatives at the Habana Conference had to meet the argument, I venture to suggest, that we did not have a force large enough to defend our own country, let alone the Western Hemisphere, and fun was made of our Army, and even our naval force, and it was even intimated that the United States, as always, was trying to get the rest of the countries of the Western Hemisphere to fight its wars, and that we were trying to fool these people into defending us. That was the kind of propaganda which, I venture to say, was disseminated in the countries to the south of us, and which our representatives had to meet.

If the pending amendment is adopted the newspapers tomorrow morning and the telegraph and cable lines tonight will send the message to South America that the Senate of the United States, which they think of as dealing primarily with foreign affairs, has taken action which they construe as turning our back on the declaration of June, which the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] reported to the Senate, and for which many Senators spoke so ably on the Senate floor, and which our delegation, together with the delegations of the other countries of the Americas, so vigorously defended in the fine sentiments expressed by them a few days ago. I venture to say that the adoption of this amendment would be contrary to the policy of our country, and dangerous to the security of our hemisphere.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The Senator complains about the restriction that the amendment will place upon the United States. Is not the whole proviso on page 2, beginning in line 2 and including line 7, a restriction in itself? As I understand the argument made by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] a moment ago, under the Constitution the President could send the Regular Army any place in the Eastern Hemisphere or Western Hemisphere.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I wish to correct that impression. I do not think the President has the constitutional right to do that. I said there was no statute prohibiting it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The Senator said he did not get much comfort out of the restriction.

Mr. HATCH. Not a bit.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Then why not strike out everything beginning with line 2 down to and including line 7, and get away from the declaration that is so objectionable to some Senators?

Mr. PEPPER. I think the committee acted in a forthright and candid way with the Senate by putting that language in, and not leaving it to Executive interpretation hereafter as to whether or not the President had that power. I think the committee—and I compliment them for it—wanted to let the world know that our military forces were available not only to defend this country but to defend this continent, and that is, of course, what we mean primarily by the term "Western Hemisphere."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only briefly. It seems to me that in discussing this measure, and the authority of the President, the Commander in Chief, it might be well for us occasionally to advert to the Constitution. What does the Constitution provide as to the power of Congress? Section 8, article I, provides that Congress shall have the power to do what? To raise and support armies. That does not mean to raise a piece of an army. It means to raise and support armies.

That does not mean simply to make an army on paper. It means to raise a real army. If an army is needed, we have the power to raise it.

Congress further has the right—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers.

Under that grant of constitutional power we could draft all the firemen in the United States. We could provide that every man who belongs to a fire company shall be automatically drafted into the Army of the United States. Who is there to say no? It is a power as broad and sweeping as the English language can make it.

What other authority has the Congress?

To make rules for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

Congress has that power. There is no limitation to it. Furthermore, we have the authority—

To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

Some Senators seem to think that that is a limitation. That does not refer to the organized National Guard or the Regular Army. That refers to the great body of the citizenship. When we speak of militia we mean every able-bodied man within the United States who is subject to military duty. Of course, we have that authority.

We find further this language:

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them—

We do not have to call them all. We can call any of them we want to call—

And for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States.

Senators say that we must not draft them in time of peace; that we must wait until the war begins; that we must wait until we are defeated, and then call out the National Guard. The Constitution provides, however, that we have authority to call out the Guard and arm them and discipline them before war begins. Is there any limitation in the Constitution upon our right to raise and support armies in time of war only? We must have an army in time of peace as well as in time of war, and the authority to raise and support armies exists in the Congress in time of peace the same as it does in time of war.

Every article of the Constitution means the same thing in time of peace that it means in time of war. Every guaranty that that instrument carries goes to the citizen in time of war as well as it does in time of peace.

Let us see what authority the President has. It must be remembered that when the Constitution was written, while its authors were trying to get away from European concepts of power, there was in their minds the British conception of the executive who controlled foreign affairs and of the executive who controlled the army. We had just come out of 8 years under the Articles of Confederation. When the Congress tried to handle our foreign affairs, through a committee, we know what a chaotic state of affairs existed. We had just come out of 8 years under the Articles of Confederation, during which the Congress had undertaken to maintain our military affairs. The States had refused to make their contributions of militia and of money. All those things were in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, and they determined to set up a strong central executive.

Senators may not like that; rather, they may wish that the President did not have as much power as he has. I am not speaking of the present President or any future President. I am speaking of the Presidency. It is an office which today perhaps carries with it more constitutional power than any reigning authority on earth. I am not speaking about the military masters that overthrow civilan authority and disregard constitutions, but I say that the Presidency has today more power than any constitutional authority on earth. He has more authority than the King of England has. The King of England is more or less of a decoration. He is a sort of painted king on a painted throne. He sits on the throne, but he has no real authority.

Let us see what the drafters of the Constitution said they would do for our Executive. They wanted to repose the central executive power somewhere. What does the Constitution say? Article II, section 1, says:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

It does not say a little of the executive power; it does not say some of the executive power; it does not say three-quarters of the executive power. It says:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

That executive power applies to the Army and Navy as well as to civilians. The Senate could not be the Commander in Chief of an army. Imagine the House of Representatives commanding an army! [Laughter.] Congress cannot command armies; it cannot direct navies. Somebody must do it, however. The makers of the Constitution said, "This is an executive function, and we will put it in the President of the United States." The people of the United States are supposed to be wise enough to pick the right man for President. They are supposed to select a man in whom they have confidence, a man who has a lofty conception of his obligation and his duties under the Constitution; and he is vested with these lofty functions. I have read the provision with respect to the general executive power.

Section 2 of Article II says:

The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States—

What President? The President of the United States—not the president of the city council, not the president of the Democratic Party or the Republican Party, but the President of the United States.

Is that all? No.

and of the militia of the several States.

Senators say that National Guard men are State officers, and that we must allow the National Guard to be run by the States. Of course, they are State National Guard men, but what does the Constitution say?

The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States.

The President is Commander in Chief of them; and as Commander in Chief he may send them anywhere he wishes in the United States. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado is simply a limitation upon the power of the President. It grants him no new authority. Whatever authority the President has as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy he derives from the Constitution of the United States, and not from an act of Congress.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator discuss the effect of the committee proviso on page 2?

Mr. CONNALLY. The effect of that proviso is that it is the will of Congress that these troops be not employed anywhere except in the territories mentioned in the joint resolution.

Mr. HATCH. It was argued that it is an implied vesting of power in the President to send the troops to any point within the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall undertake to dissipate that conception.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me finish the answer on this point, and then I shall be glad to yield.

According to my view, the language in the joint resolution itself is a limitation. It says that the troops we are now drafting may not be sent anywhere except to the places mentioned. It does not give any added authority. Whatever authority the President has, he has already.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Without this provision in the joint resolution, would the President have authority to send these particular troops to any point in the Western Hemisphere?

Mr. CONNALLY. I think he would.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator contends that he already has that authority?

Mr. CONNALLY. He has it under the Constitution. Nothing we say about it can add anything to his authority.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BONE. In view of that contemplation of the constitutional prerogative of the President, is it possible for Congress, by statute, to circumscribe the President's right?

Mr. CONNALLY. Only by the control of the purse. We may refuse to appropriate. That is the reason for the provision that no appropriation for an army shall be made for a longer period than 2 years. The purpose of that provision is to give Congress a check over the Executive in the establishment of a great military machine.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to submit this thought to the Senator: While the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, he has no extraterritorial jurisdiction. He has jurisdiction upon the high seas; that is, all our ships are entitled to traverse the high seas; but the President has no extraterritorial jurisdiction in any other country. I grant that it always has been the case that the power has been exercised, when necessary, to send the Army and Navy to protect the life or property of an American citizen in a foreign land, but that is the only sound basis on which such authority can rest. It is true, whether we all approve it or not—I heard a great many Democrats condemning it at the time, some of whom were very vociferous in their condemnation——

Mr. CONNALLY. On the floor of the Senate or in the cloakroom? [Laughter.]

Mr. GEORGE. Both. It is true that under the present Secretary of War—I believe he was then Secretary of State—we sent some marines to one of the South American countries to supervise an election. However, that authority rested upon the altogether tenable doctrine, let us say, that if that country did not have an orderly election it might have a revolution, and the property of Americans invested in that country might be endangered and perhaps violated and destroyed. However, the President of the United States may not send our Army on active duty—I do not say he may not let them visit wherever he wants them to visit—into the heart of Brazil, or into the heart of England, or into darkest Russia, or into any other nation in the world, without violating the law of nations.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator was appealing to our own law. He was not appealing to the law of nations a while ago when he said that the President had no extraterritorial authority. Let me ask the Senator from Georgia where is there anything in the Constitution or laws which says that the President may not do so?

Mr. GEORGE. There is nothing except the fact that the Constitution is a constitution for a free people which respects the rights of all other nations. Where is there anything in the Constitution which says that the President has the right to do so? The Senator's question reminds me very much of the question which was propounded to me many years ago, when an old gentleman came into my office and said, "I want you to search the lawbooks and show me where it is stated that a one-legged man has any right to make a will." [Laughter.] Of course, there is nothing in the Constitution giving the President the express right.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say, in answer to the Senator's one-legged illustration, that we would have a one-legged Army if, in time of war, the Commander in Chief could not send the Army anywhere our national interests required it to go.

Mr. GEORGE. Is the Senator talking about time of war?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am talking about any time when our interests are at stake. Let me ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I want to make it clear that if we are in war, then, of course, the war machine is in the hands of the President, and may be sent anywhere where it is deemed advisable to use military force, but not in peacetime.

Mr. CONNALLY. Not in peacetime?

Mr. GEORGE. Not in peacetime. We have no right to send our Army, let us say, into Russia in peacetime, unless Russia assents to it, and I dare say nobody would ever think we had that right, except, as it always has been held—and I think it is sound doctrine—that the President may send the Army and Navy, the armed forces of the United States, anywhere to protect the life and property of the American citizen.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is exactly the point the Senator from Texas is undertaking to make; not that he advocates the President sending the Army and the Navy around on an expedition to butt in anywhere, but that is one of the discretions which, under the Constitution, are vested in the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Mr. GEORGE. No; Mr. President.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is up to his decision, and not ours.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think the Senator from Texas wants to take that broad ground.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas has already taken it.

Mr. GEORGE. I am sorry, then, and I think the Senator had better draw himself in a little. In war that may be done, yes; but not in peacetime, because to send an army on active duty into a peaceful country would be an act of war.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly it would, and the Senator from Texas is not advocating that course. The Senator from Texas is talking about the power which is given the President of the United States. The President of the United States is Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy during the day and during the night, during peacetime and during wartime. There is no limitation on his authority as Commander in Chief.

Mr. GEORGE. And he may do as he pleases with it?

Mr. CONNALLY. He may embezzle the power, yes; but it is up to his conscience and his responsibility to tell the Army where it should go.

Mr. GEORGE. No; the Senator now is saying that the President does not have to embezzle the power; that he has it, and has it rightfully.

Mr. CONNALLY. I say he has the power, just as the Senator from Georgia has the power, to do wrong; but the Senator from Georgia is not going to do wrong, because he knows better.

Mr. GEORGE. Not if I can help it; but the President has not any power except what the Constitution gives him.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly.

Mr. GEORGE. He has not any power in peace or in war that is not drawn from the Constitution, and he cannot send the Army on active duty into a peaceful country without committing an act of war.

Mr. CONNALLY. I agree with the Senator. I am not saying that he ought to do it, but I say that under the Constitution he has the authority and the power to do it if he sees fit.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator from Texas says the President has the power to do it, but it is an embezzlement of power, then I grant that that is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. I grant that anybody who has a power and misuses it is an embezzler of power; and if any President of the United States should send the Army into a peaceful country and invade it, of course he would be doing wrong.

Mr. GEORGE. If it is a usurped power, it is not a granted power. If the power to send the Army into another country is merely usurped, it is not a granted power under the Constitution. The Constitution does not contemplate that we shall send our Army into any other country except on a declaration of war by the Congress. I have already said that there are exceptions, and those exceptions are properly exercised, I think.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think there is no real quarrel between the Senator from Georgia and myself.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say just one thing to the Senator from Georgia, and then I will yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not want to take the Senator's time.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is all right. It is the Senate's time; it is not mine.

The Senator from Georgia says we cannot take action in times of peace, but we have to wait until Congress meets and declares war before the President can send a single soldier into any other country with which we are at peace. Let us suppose that Congress were in adjournment, and we were all at home, and next week Japan—I will not use Hitler's name; I see him in my dreams, and it startles me, but I am not going to use his name in this connection—suppose Japan next week should land an army in the Republic of Panama, not on our territory, not on our soil, not attacking us, but should land an armed force in the Republic of Panama near the Panama Canal; is there any man in the Senate who would not say that the President of the United States, under his solemn obligation to the people of the United States, ought to send, and that he would be derelict in his duty if he did not send, the Navy and the armed forces, if necessary, into Panama to see that the Japanese force stayed in Panama and never crossed the line into the Panama Canal? Yet Panama is a peaceful country. We are not making war on Panama. We are defending the rights and the sovereignty and the power of the people of the United States. I submit that under the Constitution the President would have the authority to do that very thing, and if he did not do it I think he would be derelict in his duty.

I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The time of the Senator from Texas has expired.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, let me say that the Senator has well illustrated my own argument.

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will take my time on the joint resolution, and a little on the next bill that is coming up. [Laughter.]

Mr. GEORGE. I will take the floor. In the case the Senator has supposed, the President would be defending not merely the property and rights of the United States but the very territory of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what I am talking about in connection with this whole measure. I do not want to send any army over to the Fiji Islands.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I thought the Senator's time had expired; and I was about to suggest to the able leader that we recess at this time until tomorrow.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be very glad to have a recess, if I may conclude in the morning.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. Before we recess, however, I shall yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am much obliged to the Senator.

As I understand the argument of the Senator from Texas, it is that when the United States calls the militia into the service of the United States, the President of the United States under the Constitution has the right to do with the militia just as he has the right to do with any other part of the United States Army.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for an observation?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not also true that under section 10 of Article I of the Constitution, by implication certainly, if not directly, a single State has the right to go to war in its own defense?

Mr. CONNALLY. To repel invasion.

Mr. LODGE. Or in case of "imminent danger."

Mr. CONNALLY. I think that is true. I have not looked at the Constitution lately, but I have a very vivid recollection of its provisions.

Mr. LODGE. "Such imminent danger as will not admit of delay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield the floor?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield the floor, with notice that I will appeal to the Chair in the morning to recognize me.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I am afraid that, under the unanimous-consent agreement, that could not be done without unanimous consent.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have not used up my time yet.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no trouble about it; but the Senator will recall that under the unanimous-consent agreement no Senator may speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes on any amendment or the joint resolution. I want the Senator from Texas to go on tomorrow, but his action in doing so might be interpreted as making two speeches on the joint resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. If anybody objects, I will subside.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that if we recess until tomorrow the Senator from Texas may resume during the remainder of the 20 minutes that he would have on the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? None is heard.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I had hoped that we might vote on the pending amendment today, but it is obvious that we cannot do so.

The other day it was announced and generally understood that we would take up the military-training bill tomorrow, assuming that this measure would be out of the way. It is obvious that the joint resolution will have to go over until tomorrow. I am wondering if we cannot enter into an agreement to vote on the joint resolution and all amendments thereto at some hour tomorrow, suggesting 3 o'clock.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that would have been possible an hour ago; but now that we have dragged out the debate for another hour I think the Senator should make the time 4 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent, and I ask that the requirement for a roll-call be waived——

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that not later than 4 o'clock p. m. tomorrow the Senate proceed to vote without further debate on the pending joint resolution and all amendments thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I have said numbers of times that I thought the rules of the Senate ought to be observed. This particular rule that the Senate has seen fit to waive on some occasions is a rule adopted for the protection of the Senate. I do not think the Senate ought to waive that rule, which gives to Senators notice of the final vote on an important measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate that, and it will not take long to make the call. I now make the point of no quorum.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. Just a moment. Let me make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BARKLEY. Immediately after the usual roll call tomorrow to ascertain the presence of a quorum—which will not be made for the purpose of making this unanimous-consent request—will it be in order, without another roll call, for me to make this request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would think that that would be in order, without objection. If there should be no objection, the Chair would so rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wonder if we could obtain a further agreement on a limitation of debate on amendments and the joint resolution.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the matter is in good shape and that if after the roll call tomorrow the able leader will propose his unanimous-consent agreement for a vote at 4 o'clock there probably will not be any objection. I may say, as to a further limitation of debate, that I personally have no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will not propose a further limitation at this time.

CLAIMS OF MISSISSIPPI CHOCTAWS

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I shall have to be away from the Senate for the next 20 days, because the election will take place in my State on the 27th of this month. I am very much interested in Senate bill 3524, conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claims of the Choctaw Indians of the State of Mississippi, and I ask unanimous consent to have that bill now considered. There is no objection to the bill. It has been unanimously reported by the committee, and I am particularly interested in having it passed at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, there is a bill on the calendar which has to do with all matters of this kind. There is another bill pending in one of the committees—I think in the Committee on Indian Affairs—which has to do with this very matter, and it involves language which the Department of Justice has rather insisted on as being a part of any bill having to do with Indian claims.

I may say to the able Senator at this time that the matter of Indian claims has been very carefully considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, as well, and it is one which requires some reformatory legislation. The Department of Justice has suggested language which, to my mind, would be very salutary in matters of this kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCARRAN. I am sorry to have to object, as I do not believe this is a matter which should be brought up in this manner.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I am sure that the Senator from Nevada will withdraw his objection when he has had opportunity to read the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada withdraw his objection?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry about the bill. I should like to know what the provisions are in reference to the allowance of interest.

Mr. BILBO. That is set out in the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. In what way?

Mr. BILBO. By naming the parties.

Mr. ADAMS. I mean as to the interest on the claims. My reason for making the inquiry—and the Senator from Oklahoma agrees—is that there has been a very serious abuse in the allowance of interest on such claims. In the matter of ordinary claims against the Government interest is allowed for only 6 years. On Indian claims interest has been claimed clear back for 75 or 100 years, and the Department of Justice has suggested limiting interest to a 6-year period. There are Indian claims now pending before the Court of Claims aggregating $600,000 on which there is a demand for interest in the amount of $1,400,000,000.

Mr. BILBO. There is no such provision in my bill. The matter is all to be turned over to the Court of Claims.

Mr. ADAMS. But the Court of Claims will be compelled, under the law, unless there is a limitation in the act, to allow interest from the beginning of the claims, which might amount to 400 or 500 percent. That is why I was asking the Senator whether there was any limitation in the bill.

Mr. BILBO. It is my information that there is a limitation in the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. Could it go over until tomorrow morning?

Mr. BILBO. No; I am compelled to leave this evening.

Mr. ADAMS. I shall object unless I can see the provision, and see that the Government is protected in that item. If the Senator will get a copy of the bill, it will not take long.

Mr. BILBO subsequently said: Mr. President, I have examined the bill hurriedly, and in order that it may be passed, I move that it be amended by limiting the interest to 6 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3524) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claims of the Choctaw Indians of the State of Mississippi, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims be, and it is hereby, given jurisdiction to hear and determine the claims, legal or equitable, of the Choctaw Indians of the State of Mississippi against the United States for losses claimed to have been caused by the failure of the United States, its officers, agents, or representatives, to comply with, perform, and execute the provisions of treaties, agreements, or statutes of the United States relating to the reservations, lands, funds, and citizenship rights of said Indians, in regard to the following matters:

(a) The claims of the Choctaw Indians of Mississippi and of other reservees arising under the treaty of September 27, 1830, known as the Treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek (7 Stat. L. 333), for compensation for the failure to grant to them the lands to which they were entitled under said treaty, and for the value of scrip or indemnity for the same to which said Indians and reservees were entitled under the acts of Congress approved August 23, 1842 (5 Stat. L. 513), and March 3, 1845 (5 Stat. L. 777), including interest at 5 percent per annum for a period not to exceed 6 years.

(b) The claims of said Choctaw Indians of Mississippi for compensation for the loss of their interest, vested or contingent, in the assets or property of the Choctaw Nation to which they were entitled under the provisions of the several treaties and agreements between the United States and the Choctaw Nation and statutes of the United States relating thereto (1) by representation to said Indians that the United States would provide for their removal; (2) by advising against their accepting the aid of private persons to effect their removal; (3) by the failure to give reasonable notice or aid in their removal; (4) by the disapproval of a roll of identification containing the names of a large number of said Choctaws, which roll had been held without action by the Secretary of the Interior for a long period of time and was disapproved without consideration of its merits by said Secretary upon representation to him by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that if approved the time for removal of those identified would extend beyond the date fixed for the final closing of the rolls of citizenship of the Choctaw Nation; or (5) by the action of the United States in allotting lands and distributing the property of the Choctaw Nation in disregard of the provisions of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Nation of April 28, 1866, with respect to the citizenship rights of the Choctaws of Mississippi: Provided, That if the said court shall find that the said Choctaws of Mississippi had a vested or contingent property right of which they were deprived by any of the foregoing causes, each person whose rights were lost thereby shall be entitled to an award of the average value of the interest so lost by him, including his proportionate share in the funds and proceeds of the property of said nation as distributed to the enrolled members thereof, and the average value as of the time of loss of the individual allotments made to citizens of the Choctaw Nation: Provided, however, That the jurisdiction conferred by this act shall not extend to or embrace any claim or claims of any nature against the Choctaw Nation of Indians in Oklahoma, but solely to claims against the United States asserted by those Indians hereby authorized to sue, and no sum or sums recovered in any action hereby authorized or sums appropriated in payment or settlement thereof shall ever be the subject of a charge against or claim for reimbursement out of any of the property or funds of the said Choctaw Nation of Indians in Oklahoma, directly or indirectly, or as a set-off or counterclaim against any claim or demand of said nation against the United States now or hereafter asserted, whether said claim or demand be of a legal or equitable nature, or for a gratuity.

SEC. 2. That this action shall be brought in said Court of Claims as a class action by a representative number of said Choctaws of Mississippi in their own behalf and in behalf of others similarly situated, and the petition or petitions filed under the provisions of this act may be executed and verified by J. A. Riddell as the representative of said petitioners and of all those in whose behalf said petition or petitions are filed and signed by William E. Richardson and Thomas E. Rhodes as attorneys for said Indians, and said representative and said attorneys are hereby authorized to prosecute said claims to the final conclusion of any action brought hereunder.

SEC. 3. That any petition or petitions filed in the said Court of Claims under the provisions of this act shall be submitted to said court within 2 years from the date of this act, and said cause or causes shall thereupon be proceeded with in accordance with the law and practice of said court, and any claims not so presented within the said period of 2 years shall be thereafter forever barred.

SEC. 4. That the hearing and adjudication of said claims shall be governed by equitable principles and shall fairly and finally determine the merits of the claims of said Indians and the obligations of the United States to them in administering the affairs of Indians subject to the guardianship and authority of the United States, in accordance with the customary action and precedents in the conduct of the estates of incompetent Indians, if the court shall find that said Mississippi Choctaw Indians were in fact as a group incompetent to manage their own affairs.

SEC. 5. That the amount of any judgment rendered in said cause when appropriated shall be set aside as a special fund to be paid or disbursed to the persons legally entitled to receive the same only upon such terms and conditions as Congress may by its subsequent legislation direct: Provided, however, That in entering its final judgment in said cause the Court of Claims shall hear and determine the amount, not to exceed 10 percent of the amount of any final award, which on a quantum meruit basis it shall find to be a reasonable compensation for the respective services and expenses of J. A. Riddell as the representative and of William E. Richardson and Thomas E. Rhodes as attorneys for said Indians as a class, heretofore rendered, or which may hereafter be rendered in the suit authorized by the provisions of this act, and shall as a part of said judgment award so much thereof as may be necessary to pay said compensation and reimbursement upon the basis herein directed to such person or persons, respectively, as the said court may find entitled thereto.

SEC. 6. That said court shall have further jurisdiction to hear and determine any counterclaims or counterdemands on the part of the United States against the said Choctaw Indians of Mississippi upon the said basis of equity and justice as directed in respect to the adjudication of all matters under the authority of this act.

SEC. 7. That either party aggrieved by any final decision of the said Court of Claims in said cause shall have the right to appeal such final decision to the Supreme Court of the United States as provided by law in respect to appeals from the Court of Claims to said Supreme Court: Provided, That on the question of the validity of the claim or claims of said Choctaw Indians against the United States, or any counterclaims or demands of the United States against said Indians, the appellate jurisdiction of said Supreme Court of the United States is hereby expressly extended to the hearing and determination of an appeal by or on behalf of said Choctaw Indians or the United States.

SEC. 8. That for the purpose of this act the term "Choctaws of the State of Mississippi" shall include only reservees under the treaty of September 27, 1830, and their descendants; those persons who on July 1, 1902, were residents in the States of Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana, having not less than one-eighth Choctaw Indian blood, and their descendants, and such persons as were thereafter identified on any approved roll of Mississippi Choctaws and their descendants, and shall not include any persons who were enrolled on the final citizenship rolls of the Choctaw Nation in Oklahoma.

Mr. ADAMS. I suggest that the amendment be inserted in line 12, on page 2, after the words "per annum," to add the words "for a period not to exceed 6 years."

Mr. BILBO. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be necessary to strike out some words in line 12. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 2, line 12, after the words "per annum," to strike out the words "as provided in the latter act" and to insert "for a period not to exceed 6 years."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JULIUS O. ADLER

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, yesterday the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT] made some uncomplimentary remarks about various individuals who live in New York City, one of them being Julius O. Adler, who is vice president and general manager of the New York Times. I shall not take time to discuss the remarks of the Senator, the RECORD speaks for itself, but I do wish to put into the RECORD a general order of the War Department bestowing on Mr. Adler the Distinguished Service Cross for gallantry while serving with the Army in France during the World War. The citation reads:

[Citation from Decorations United States Army, 1862 to 1926, Published by the War Department, Office of the Adjutant General, 1927]

DISTINGUISHED SERVICE CROSS

Adler, Julius O. At St. Juvin, France, Oct. 14, 1918. R. New York, New York. B. Chattanooga, Tenn. G. O., No. 44, W. D., 1919. Major, Three Hundred and Sixth Infantry, Seventy-seventh Division.

"Accompanied by another officer, Major Adler was supervising the work of clearing the enemy from St. Juvin when they suddenly came upon a party of the enemy numbering 150. Firing on the enemy with his pistol, Major Adler ran toward the party, calling on them to surrender. His bravery and good marksmanship resulted in the capture of 50 Germans, and the remainder fled."

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Robert L. Russell, of Georgia, to be United States district judge for the northern district of Georgia, to fill a new position.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed.

That completes the Executive Calendar.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, August 8, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate August 7 (legislative day of August 5, 1940)

POSTMASTERS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 7, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., pastor of Gunton Temple Memorial Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, whose strength is invincible and whose resources are inexhaustible, hitherto Thou hast blessed us, for by Thy mercies we have been spared and by Thy power we are sustained.

May we enter upon each day unafraid for we know that we cannot drift beyond Thy love and care. Amid all the confusion and fluctuating shadows of a troubled world, may we go about our daily duties with confidence in the Eternal God, who is too wise to err and too kind to withhold from us that which is needful.

Bless the lonely of soul with Thy fellowship and the wounded of heart with Thy healing. Reveal Thy mercy unto all who are in dire plight of faith by reason of bitter sorrow and disappointment. Lift the light of Thy countenance upon all from whom the sun is veiled by the pale cast of fear and foreboding.

Unto the Christ we ascribe all praise and thanksgiving. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONSCRIPTION IN PEACETIME

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, we in this body are soon to be confronted with a question which perhaps will be one of the greatest questions ever to confront the American people and the American Congress. That question is whether or not we shall surrender individual liberty and freedom as we have known it in this country, and in its place establish a despotism never before known in this Nation in time of peace.

It is interesting to note that during the Civil War in this country, out of 2,690,000 men enrolled in the Union Army, only 255,000 were secured by the draft. The issue then was the preservation of the Union. In the World War, during the first 3 weeks of voluntary enlistments in the Eastern States having a population of 18,000,000, when men were asked to fight on foreign soil only 3,594 volunteered.

It seems to me a question which proposes to extend the strong arm of the Government into every home in the United States ought to be approached with the greatest caution on the part of the American Congress. We are taking a long step to bring to the United States a policy that has dominated Europe for more than 1,000 years. Let us beware before we substitute force for patriotism. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

COOPERATING WITH THE PRESIDENT

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a very unusual telegram. For the first time in the history of the county of Monroe in the State of New York, the Republicans have asked me to cooperate with the President wholeheartedly. Recently—to be exact, on the 18th day of July—the President in a radio address stated that he had spent many sleepless nights pondering over the troubles of this country and that he planned and wished to retire to private life in January 1941. To help him realize this hope, the Republicans of my district want me to cooperate with him to see that this request is granted that he does retire to private life in January 1941. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman include all three of his constituents when he says "all"?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I thank my friend from Mississippi for the very generous contribution he has made, because my distinguished friend forgets I have more voters in my district than he has in his whole State. I also extend an invitation to those Democrats who feel like helping the President realize his ambition to retire in January 1941 to join us in our effort. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks and to include therein a speech given by J. Edgar Hoover on August 7.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

EUROPEAN FOOD RELIEF

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, at this time I should like to direct the attention of the membership to a resolution I have just introduced. This resolution provides that a European Food Distribution Commission be appointed by the President for the purpose of aiding a great number of people subject to starvation in Europe who are in no way responsible for the present war.

The statement attributed to Ambassador John Cudahy, which was published in this morning's paper, lends importance to my proposal.

Let us adopt my resolution and, by so doing, we will again assume world leadership on behalf of helpless people. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address by Ambassador Josephus Daniels, who presided at the Bryan breakfast at the Chicago convention, Wednesday morning, July 17, 1940.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON]?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order for today, Calendar Wednesday, may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]?

There was no objection.

CONGRESSIONAL COURTESY

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether in my service of 8 years I quite entertained such a distressed spirit as I did this morning on reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the morning newspapers. For Members of a congressional body to characterize themselves as was done in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the manner indicated this morning is a frightful reflection on the Congress. In addition, there appeared on the front page of the papers this morning the account of a closed meeting of a House committee in which Members reflected on the patriotism of each other. Have we become so wanting in tolerance, have we become so devoid in forbearance, that this Congress cannot set a good example for the American people as we discuss highly controversial measures and proposals? If so, it is going to have a definite effect and impact on the thinking of the people of the country as this thing appears on the front pages of the papers from one ocean to the other. The time has come for us to be a little more forbearing, tolerant, and discriminating in our remarks and attitudes one toward another. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THILL]?

There was no objection.

THE THIRD TERM

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, a most significant thing happened last Sunday. The Cincinnati Enquirer for probably 100 years has been one of the outstanding Democratic papers of the Nation. On last Sunday on its front page appeared an editorial of great significance, which reads as follows:

CREDO NO. 1

I am an American.

I believe in American institutions. I believe in American ideals, in American standards of living and morals, and, above all else, in the blessed heritage of liberty bequeathed by the founders of this free Nation.

Whether I call myself a Democrat or a Republican is inconsequential. I am not a New Dealer. No one holding my beliefs can give aid, comfort, or support to a leadership that is destroying the sound principles of representative government enunciated by Thomas Jefferson and applied by Abraham Lincoln.

I am for preservation of the Republic as a republic, and not for its conversion into a socialistic state with totalitarian power in Washington. I am opposed to a regimentation of the manpower of this country. I don't believe that prosperity can be established by application of the doctrine of scarcity. I don't believe that this Nation can spend itself into financial health and strength. I don't believe in the incitation of class hatred, nor do I believe that character and courage can be built by destroying the initiative and independence of the individual.

I am for a government of laws created by intelligent, untrammeled, clear-thinking, patriotic legislative bodies; a government of laws interpreted and applied by a free judiciary, uninfluenced by political considerations or pressure, and, finally, I am for a government in which the Chief Executive does not assume to exercise all three governmental functions. I am not a New Dealer.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. By whom is that written?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. It was written by the editor of the Cincinnati Enquirer.

[Here the gavel fell.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER]?

There was no objection.

THE PRESIDENT AND ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I note in the Post of June 7 that President Roosevelt at that time informed Democratic leaders it was imperative that Congress adjourn by June 22. It states:

Mr. Roosevelt advised his chieftains that he would send a message to Congress on the adjournment date, in which he will say that all necessary legislation to meet the present war threat had been enacted.

Previous to the time that statement was made by the President, Congress appropriated about $5,000,000,000 for the Army and Navy in preparation for war. Since the time he said Congress should adjourn he has asked the Congress to appropriate $5,000,000,000 additional money, making $10,000,000,000 in all. Now, tell me, in the name of the American people, what is this great war hysteria about? Who is going to war on the United States? Who said we are going to have a war? There is considerable talk about the conscription bill, but it seems to me that if we would do less talking about war and forget about it, we will never get into war, and I hope that we will have no conscription and no war. If we want more men for our Army and Navy, why not make it financially as attractive as the C. C. C. boys, who get $30 a month, at least, or $40 a month for 1 year's service, and we will probably get all the boys to join our Army we need? It is certainly worth a trial at least before we conscript. By offering proper inducement, those who want to serve will have the opportunity and we will not have to demand those who do not care to serve for a year to go against their will. Are we to become a militaristic nation? Are we going to create a great army and navy in peacetime? Who is going to attack us? Certainly not Canada. Certainly not Mexico. Then who? Why all this war hysteria? Who wants war? I do not.

[Here the gavel fell.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I was granted 20 minutes to address the House today. I now ask unanimous consent that I may have an additional 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the W. P. A. and to include certain extracts from newspapers and letters received in this connection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter I have received and an editorial, and also to address the House at this time for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am today placing on the Speaker's desk a petition to discharge the committee from further consideration of the Geyer anti-poll-tax bill.

When we are talking these days about reaching down into these 8 Southern States and taking those young men and putting them into uniform, let us first give them a little democracy for which they can fight. There are three and a half million colored people without the vote and 7,000,000 white people without the vote in those Southern States. I hope my colleagues on my right will do something to clean this thing up that exists in our own democratic one-party States.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, of all the stupid attacks I have ever heard made, the one coming from the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER] on the people of the Southern States is about the limit. It comes with poor grace from a man representing the district in which Harry Bridges, the Communist trouble-maker lives, and especially one who voted against the deportation of Harry Bridges, to be continuously arising in the House and maligning the people of other States about their election laws, or the way they conduct their internal affairs, and about which he knows absolutely nothing.

If the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER] wants to do some cleaning up, as he calls it, let him begin in his own district, and get rid of Communists, such as Harry Bridges, and stop his silly, false, malicious, and insidious attacks on the people of the Southern States.

The bill to which he refers will never become a law, as all well-informed Members of the House know. But I am getting tired of having a few Members arise on this floor and make these misleading statements without regard to the facts or the feelings of the rest of the membership.

They are constantly telling the country that only a few thousand voters go to the polls in Mississippi, or in other Southern States, and then pointing out the number of their Representatives in the House, to try to leave the impression that only a few people are permitted to participate in selecting their Members of Congress or other officials.

Now, as a matter of fact, in those States where there is only one party, as is the case in Mississippi, and practically all the other Southern States, our battles are settled in the primaries and there is no opposing ticket in the general election. Therefore, the vote in the general election is very light. These facts are well known to all the Members of the House with the exception of the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER], and the probable exception of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Even in those districts where a Republican candidate does run, in the general election, in those States, he invariably does not attract enough attention to bring any appreciable number of voters to the polls. The last time a Republican put his name on the ticket in the district I represent he polled 391 votes to my 19,208.

I seriously doubt that if the stentorian gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] were to move down into that country, run for Congress, and stump one of those southern districts from one end to the other he would get 250 votes in the general election, even if every man, woman, and child in the district were permitted to go to the polls and vote, without paying a poll tax. And I doubt if the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER] who would evidently have to run on the Democratic ticket if he ran at all, would get 10 votes to the county, if those people learned of his record in the Bridges case.

It is about time to stop this nonsense of trying to mislead the American people, or the Members of Congress, on this proposition.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker and fellow Members, it is becoming pretty well aired about now that Mr. Willkie asked to meet "the champ" and, of course, that is putting the Presidency of the United States somewhat on the basis of a prize fight, but let it go at that. He got his wish when the Democratic Party nominated the "champ."

The greatest subject before the people today and the one in which they are most keenly interested, perhaps, is that of the selective draft, and, after the manner of a champ, the President immediately announced how he stands on that question, but the man who wanted to meet "the champ" is still on his bicycle. He has not decided whether to lead with a right or a left. I think he is trying to determine that from the voice in the gallery, the voice heard in Philadelphia, that said, "We want Willkie," that he may determine by it which side that gallery is on. You see when the gong starts the fight starts and the fight has started. Round one is already on or, perhaps, round two. Of course, Mr. Willkie has come out, I understand, and has said that the Democratic farm program is O. K., so we just wonder whether he will lead with a right or a left on the draft issue, or whether he actually meets "the champ" or merely bicycles away from him.

[Here the gavel fell.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KEE] may have leave of absence for 5 days on account of official duties.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

HARRY BRIDGES

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I believe that was a well-directed remark upon the part of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] that gentlemen should confine their efforts to their own districts. Unfortunately some Members endeavor to confine their efforts to my district and tell my district what to do with respect to the motion-picture industry bill, which was fortunately defeated. The gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER] represents a district from which comes Mr. Harry Bridges, or at least a lot of his activity is expended in his district, and is directed there by Mr. Bridges. I used to be supervisor, and my district included Wilmington, San Pedro, and Long Beach, and I know some of the activities in that section. I think if the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER] would direct some of his activity to trying to get Harry Bridges out of this country, his efforts would be well directed. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

MR. WENDELL WILLKIE

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute, and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen on the left, I hear gentlemen on the left every day announcing that this man and some other man will oppose President Roosevelt's election. The gentlemen to whom they refer are usually some ex-Congressmen or ex-Senators or some ex-officeholders who have been repudiated by their people. They are generals who have no army behind them. The people of America, the masses of sensible people who have no special interest in mind except the interest of the country, are at heart with Mr. Roosevelt, and they will again elect him President of the United States, because they appreciate his great work and the service which he has rendered to our country. [Applause.]

SOUTHERN REPRESENTATION

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], the electricity expert, made a plea a few moments ago in favor of State rights. With reference to his demanding that the Federal bureaucracy here in Washington regulate the electric utilities in the State of Mississippi, and the other States in the Union, I suggest that he practice what he preaches today about State rights. I sincerely hope that the Geyer poll-tax legislation will be enacted. In the State of Mississippi, because of the Mississippi poll tax, seven Members of Congress in the last election received a total of 32,000 votes—less than one-half of the votes cast for each Congressman in most of the congressional districts north of the Mason and Dixon's line. Let us enforce the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution and reduce representation in the Southern States in compliance with the fourteenth amendment, so that we will have representation in Congress from the Southern New Deal States and Electoral College in conformity with the spirit and the letter of the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

MR. WENDELL WILLKIE

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], so far as his reference to the men who are supporting Mr. Willkie is concerned, may I say that those few men out of the New Deal Cabinet who forced the nomination of the President for a third term, or assisted him, have never demonstrated their vote-getting ability. Not one man who was back of that proposition or acted with him in any way has ever come out and been elected to office. Not one of them would have the courage to expose himself to the electorate. They have been pulled out of the bushes some place and appointed to office by the President, regardless of ability or influence, and when it comes down to votes for the President that crowd has never demonstrated any ability to collect votes, and they will not demonstrate any such ability next fall. There was one gentleman among them. That was Jim Farley, who could commandeer votes, but he walked out on them.

May I say to the gentleman from Illinois that there were a few good men coming up during the last few years, but the President did like Charley McCarthy—he "mowed them down" and Wallace "plowed them under."

UNIFORM COVERAGE IN FEDERAL INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4070) to provide for uniform coverage of certain persons employed in coal-mining operations with respect to insurance benefits provided for by certain Federal acts, and for other purposes, and for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 4070 and consider the same. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. This is the bill that was called up the other day, which I asked to have go over.

Mr. CROSSER. That is correct.

Mr. MICHENER. I have conferred with the minority members of the committee, and have no objection at this time.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BOLLES. I do.

Mr. CROSSER. But I understood that the gentleman had no objection.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his right to object?

Mr. BOLLES. I want further examination of this bill. I want discussion of this bill. I am opposing this bill, and I object to its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects to the unanimous-consent request.

PERMITTING AMERICAN VESSELS TO ASSIST IN EVACUATION OF REFUGEE CHILDREN

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 562 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 562

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 10213, a bill to permit American vessels to assist in the evacuation from the war zones of certain refugee children. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], to be in turn yielded by him as he sees fit.

I now yield myself 4 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this is a rule on the so-called refugee children bill which is sponsored by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. This is an open rule on a very important subject. I do not have anything to say, I am sure, that would throw any light on the subject, but I think it is a matter of utmost importance and deep gravity, and should receive the careful attention of this House.

In just a few words, this bill seeks to amend the present neutrality law to permit American ships to go into combat zones, from which they are now prohibited, to bring from those zones and the foreign countries involved, certain refugee children who would otherwise be permitted to come into this country.

The bill in no sense amends the present immigration law. It merely amends the neutrality law to permit American ships to go into those zones for the sole purpose of bringing those children out of those zones.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Will this entail any financial obligation upon the Government of the United States?

Mr. COLMER. None that I understand. I would not be positive about that.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas, a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, who is an authority on that question.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. In response to the question asked by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO], whether or not this would entail any financial expense, the answer is emphatically no; that it does not authorize or direct. It simply modifies the neutrality law so that these ships may go in, but there is no expense to the Government and with no assumption on the part of the Government at all.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I would like to inquire what refugees will be brought in under this bill?

Mr. COLMER. The children of any nation could be brought in; that is, any of the belligerent nations, who would otherwise be admissible.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. How are we to determine that they are refugees?

Mr. COLMER. That is a matter that is to be worked out by the authorities.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BLOOM. I will say to the gentleman that will be explained afterward when we take up the bill for debate, but there are organizations in England which are determining the children who should be classed as refugees. There is no special classification, either rich or poor. Anyone that these societies can find a place for in this country will be determined as refugees. It has no classification with regard to nationalities. Any refugee child in England today or in any part of the war-stricken countries may be determined as a refugee.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will this be limited to refugee children of the Allies?

Mr. COLMER. Most certainly not.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 additional minutes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I would like to find out about how many children are supposed to be involved in this?

Mr. COLMER. I cannot answer that question. I doubt if anybody else could.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Then if poor children are brought here, what arrangements will be made to take care of them?

Mr. COLMER. If the gentleman will defer that question until the matter is taken up later, I am sure that will all be explained.

Mr. BLOOM. We will be glad to answer all those questions later in the debate.

Mr. COLMER. As I said at the outset, this is a most serious matter. It is an amendment of the present neutrality law. I think the present neutrality law has prevented this country from becoming involved in this war up to this time, because we have kept our ships out of those zones. I do not think there is any question but what this country would be involved in this war today if it had not been for that provision of the neutrality bill. Now, this is a deviation and one which should certainly be fully and seriously considered by the Congress.

It is a question of whether, in our desire to be of assistance to humanity, we should make this departure from the present law. Personally I doubt if this legislation, if enacted by Congress, will amount to a great deal. I say that for two reasons: First, the legislation requires that the safe conduct of these vessels be guaranteed by all of the belligerent nations. I doubt that that will happen. Suppose, for instance, application is made to Germany for safe conduct for one of these vessels for these refugee children, and Germany simply does nothing about it. In her business of prosecuting the war she does not answer that request. Then it would be nugatory. The ship could not go there and therefore I doubt, from that standpoint, if it would be practical.

Then the other question involved, it seems to me, is whether the English people, whom of course this bill in its final analysis is aimed to assist, would be willing for their children, in this bitter sea warfare, to embark upon a vessel under those hazardous conditions.

You can readily see what would happen if an American vessel with, say, 2,000 or 2,500 small, innocent English children were sunk in passage. What a furor would be raised in this country. We would be upon the verge of war.

Mr. Speaker, this is a humane effort on the part of a great humane government to save the lives of possibly untold thousands of innocent, helpless, little children. While I have some misgivings about its practical operation and am appreciative of its serious implications, I shall support the resolution and the legislation.

What I have tried to say is that I think this House ought to give serious consideration to this legislation, and when the sponsor of the bill and those familiar with it who have given great study to it address you on the subject I hope you will give them the attention they deserve and to the subject the serious thought it merits.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of business and other special orders today I may address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PERMITTING AMERICAN VESSELS TO ASSIST IN EVACUATION OF REFUGEE CHILDREN

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, this is a fair and open rule, and there should be no objection to the rule or to the consideration of this important piece of legislation. This is a humanitarian proposal, nothing more or nothing less. We, in the United States, should be grateful and thankful every day in the week that we are able to keep out of the European War, and we propose to try to keep out of foreign wars now and hereafter. But we have a certain moral and humanitarian duty and obligation to those stricken European nations suffering as a result of the horrors of modern warfare.

This proposal merely enables Americans who want to, to provide the money to send mercy ships over to bring back refugee children from the war-stricken countries of Europe. It also provides that before they may do so all belligerent nations must give their approval and consent, in order to guarantee the safety of these ships. In other words, Great Britain, Italy, and Germany must consent to having these American ships go into the war zone to bring back refugee children. It is not a matter of compulsion, we cannot force Germany, England, or Italy to give their consent, but I am inclined to believe that all of these countries, if properly asked, will gladly give their consent to a humanitarian proposal of this kind. I think it will have the support of most of the American people, certainly of all the church elements in the country, for it is a step toward providing shelter and safety to the youth of Europe, and at this moment particularly of England.

No one in this Congress knows when total war will break out in England. No one knows whether it will break out this week or next month, but when it does English cities may be wiped out by airplane bombs and hundreds of thousands of helpless and innocent children wounded or killed.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Some question has been raised, and several Members have asked me, with reference to the effect the passage of this resolution might have on increasing the number of immigrants to come into this country.

Mr. FISH. This does not interfere at all with our immigration laws. Most of these children will come into the country under temporary visas of 6 months' duration.

If the war is over in 6 months, they will go back home. If the war should continue for a year, I assume the visas would be extended another 6 months. If anyone wants to come in from England under the American quota, the quota is far from exhausted; and if these children want to come in permanently, they can come in until the quota is exhausted. But, according to the British Government as announced by its Ambassador, Lord Lothian, not more than 50,000 English children have applied for admission into this country. I doubt very much whether private capital will be able to provide sufficient ships to bring over as many as 50,000. The Congress of the United States should not in any way put any monkey wrenches into the machinery of this idealistic measure, or in any way delay the immediate consideration of this humanitarian proposel to enable those who have the money to provide the means to bring these young war victims out of the danger zones. This, in a nutshell, is the proposition, and it is not only humanitarian but it is idealistic, generous, and the American way.

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BEAM. I am sympathetic with what the gentleman says, but I am interested to know if the children from other countries, for instance, Poland, Belgium, and so forth, are to be beneficiaries of this legislation.

Mr. FISH. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. This bill does not apply to England alone; it applies to all war-stricken countries equally. It could apply to China, to Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, and France, or to any other country that may be invaded. I do not believe I would support the measure if it applied to any one particular nation.

Mr. BEAM. I am glad to hear the gentleman state that because we are interested in all these children.

Mr. FISH. As soon as I get through discussing this phase of the bill I want to go a little further and make some remarks regarding the appalling famine situation arising in western Europe. I could not support this bill if an amendment were adopted to do away with the proviso which requires the consent and approval of all belligerent nations. I think it would be extremely dangerous to strike that out and to permit these mercy ships to go into the war zones without any guaranty. It would be too dangerous for the children themselves and too dangerous for the United States of America, because it might involve us in war.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. Then the picture painted by the gentleman from Missisippi of a ship with 2,500 children on it being sunk could not possibly happen if we live up to that clause and that protection?

Mr. FISH. I would advise the House to vote down the bill if that clause is stricken out.

Mr. MASON. I will, too.

Mr. FISH. As long as I am in the Congress of the United States I will do nothing that will jeopardize the peace of America or do anything to involve us in war.

Mr. MASON. That is the one clause in the bill that protects us from becoming involved in the war.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. Does the gentleman not believe that if we make it clear this will also include German children and Italian children, in case they also become refugees, it would clarify the situation?

Mr. FISH. The language is perfectly clear. It does apply to Germans, to the French, Dutch, and Belgians, and to all refugee children equally.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BLOOM. I may say to the gentleman this bill does not mention any nation or any of the belligerent countries. It is an open bill and applies to any country that is named in the proclamation issued by the President. If you are going to name Germany, then you will have to name all of the countries. This applies to all countries now.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman wanted to have the issue clarified for the House so that it will be definitely understood. As the bill is written all countries are provided for.

Mr. BLOOM. It says so in the bill.

Mr. KELLER. I did not ask whether we should mention Germany or any other nation in the bill. What has occurred to me is simply this: If we pass the bill, and I hope we will, I want it made clear that when we ask for these rights to go in there and have our ships respected, we can say to Germany and Italy, "Your refugee children will also be included in this," and I think under those circumstances we will receive the kind of consideration we should.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is correct. If we had specified Great Britain, for instance, all these other nations would object, and they would have a right to object, but we have specified no nation. This is a humane proposition. We are trying to do our bit in America to fight man's inhumanity against man.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I am sympathetic with the object sought to be attained by the bill. In view of some of the pictures we have seen of these refugee children coming from abroad with their governesses and their nurses, may I ask if the adults in charge of the children should not be limited to American citizen adult personnel?

Mr. FISH. Permit me to read in answer to the gentleman an extract from a letter from the British Ambassador, Lord Lothian, to me under the date of July 30, 1940:

> Applications to the Children's Overseas Reception Board for evacuation to the United States already exceeds 32,000, of which 10,000 are for located homes. It is estimated that the applications would reach a figure of 50,000. The great majority of these children are from homes other than those of rich parents. Ninety-eight percent of the applications are in respect to children from grant-aided schools.

This shows that 98 percent of the English children will come from poor parents.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. How about this adult personnel? Under the present language you can bring in just as many adult nurses and tutors as you can children. There is no provision preventing that.

Mr. FISH. This bill in no way changes the immigration laws. Those nurses might be able to get a temporary visa or if they wanted to they could get permanent visas because the quota is far from exhausted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. There has been some discussion here about the children of Belgium, Poland, Norway, and Sweden. Is it not a fact that under present conditions Great Britain is sending boats over here, bringing their children over here, and has access to this country, while the boats of Norway, Poland, Belgium, and Sweden have difficulty coming over here? Under this bill it would permit them all to come over?

Mr. FISH. There is no discrimination in the bill. It would permit all refugee children to come over. May I say that the reason why the British Government does not send them over in their own ships is contained in Lord Lothian's letter, part of which reads as follows:

His Majesty's Government has decided that it cannot assume the responsibility for sending children to the North American continent in British ships unless they are convoyed. As there is a lack of convoyed British ships at present the Board is unable itself to take the responsibility for sending children to the United States.

The ships that we send over there will not be convoyed, under the terms of this bill, and under the provisions of the bill the American flag must be flown at all times, spotlighted at night, and painted on both sides of the ship, like the Red Cross ships under a previous act of the Congress.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. As a matter of fact, will there be any refugee children come except from Great Britain?

Mr. FISH. I rather think that at the moment the children in the greatest danger are the British children. I think for the next few months—and I hope this bill will be passed within the next few days. The children to come here will probably be British children in order to get them out of the war zone immediately and away from the dangers of airplane bombing that is expected over the big cities of England within the next 30 days.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. They will not come here under the quota?

Mr. FISH. The English quota is still unexhausted, but refugee children could come from other nations on temporary visas for 6 months, which could be extended if necessary.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. In other words, it is planned for all of them to come in under temporary visas.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. What would happen if the war should last 5 years or 6 years or 10 years? We might extend them and extend them and then they might marry here.

Mr. FISH. If the war should last a long time these visas would be extended. Naturally, we cannot bring over a great quantity of children. I do not believe we can bring over the 50,000. I do not believe we can get enough money to send the ships over to take care of 50,000, but if the war should last these visas would be extended until the war ended, if it were 1 year or 5 years. They are all young children; and all of these children, before they come here and before they get on an American ship, have been assured that American citizens are willing to adopt them and their ability to take care of them has been investigated and approved. So we are in no way bothered financially, or in any other way, if they should remain here 1 or 2 or 3 years.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to my friend from Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR. I may say that I am in sympathy with the spirit of this bill, but ought there not to be some limitation? If we are going to hold out to the whole world that we are going to be an asylum for all the oppressed children, ought we not to put in a limitation of 5,000,000 or 10,000,000 or 25,000,000, so we will know where we are going?

Mr. FISH. I may say to the gentleman I think it would be probably a happy and proper thing to put in a limitation of 100,000.

Mr. TAYLOR. It seems to me that is important.

Mr. FISH. I do not believe we could reach that figure, or anywhere near that figure. I do not think we can even reach the figure of 50,000; but I certainly believe, as one who is a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, that I would vote for any such amendment limiting it to 100,000, and that would take care of what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] also has in mind.

Mr. TAYLOR. And ought there not to be a limitation on the personnel that can come along with them? Will not all the fathers and mothers and cousins and uncles and aunts want to come along with them?

Mr. FISH. I do not believe the fathers and mothers can come over.

Mr. MASON. The bill specifies "under 16 years of age."

Mr. FISH. Only nurses can come over, I understand, with the younger children.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do feel there ought to be a limitation of that kind.

Mr. FISH. This is a wide-open rule, and I am sure we all want to do the humanitarian thing and at the same time we want to protect American interests.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes.

Mr. FISH. And I think any proper amendment like that ought to be accepted by the committee, and while I do not speak for the committee, I believe the committee will accept any such amendment.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. Is this bill approved by the Department of State?

Mr. FISH. I cannot answer that question. Does any member of the Foreign Affairs Committee know whether this bill has been approved by the State Department?

Mr. BLOOM. I will say, "Yes."

Mr. FISH. That is a good guess, Sol.

Mr. BLOOM. No; it is not a good guess.

Mr. FISH. Well, I will guess the same way.

Mr. STEFAN. If the gentleman will yield further, the quota from Great Britain, as I understand, is 65,000 a year.

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. And under the quota there can come from Great Britain 10 percent per month.

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. Does the gentleman know how many of the British citizens have taken advantage of the quota this year under the 10 percent per month or has that 10 percent per month been changed and made flexible in order to bring over these children?

Mr. FISH. I think very few British citizens have taken advantage of it, but on the other hand I understand the quota has been changed so that if these refugee children want to come in permanently, they can come in beyond the quota allowed for each month but not beyond the total of the annual quota.

Mr. STEFAN. Then more than 10 percent British children could come in under the regular quota of 65,000?

Mr. FISH. That is right.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman also understand that last year 63,000 British people did not take advantage of the quota?

Mr. FISH. That is correct.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. It is the belief of many that this legislation really is not necessary, that the President has the power under section 3 (a) of the present act to allow these ships to go over there and bring the refugee children into this country? But as the President has not acted this legislation is considered necessary, is it not, in order to expedite the matter?

Mr. FISH. This is an amendment to the neutrality law. I doubt very much whether the President has that power. If he did exercise it, it might be questioned.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. DUNN. I wonder if it is possible for us to bring every person from Europe over to this country?

Mr. FISH. No; I do not think it is, and I do not think it is desirable.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I will take 5 minutes more.

Mr. HARE. Does not the gentleman think there should be some limitation as to what countries these refugees should come from?

Mr. FISH. No; I do not believe in specifying any nation, but I think they should come from the war zones or the war-stricken countries.

Mr. HARE. Does not the gentleman think that making no discrimination would be a contribution to Germany and to her carrying on her warfare?

Mr. FISH. Not in any possible way. Germany has to approve this bill before it becomes operative, and I hope that she will.

Mr. HARE. She will approve it and send all of these refugees over here for us to support.

Mr. FISH. They are not sending German children out of Germany.

Mr. HARE. But they may send children out of conquered countries.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. In respect to the suggestion that German children might come here, I think under the language of this bill it could not apply to German children, because this specifies children under 16 years of age fleeing from the war zone. No German children are fleeing from the war zone.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I shall now digress for a moment from this bill, though not very far, and read a statement from the American Ambassador to Belgium, Mr. John Cudahy, and I hope the House will bear with me for a few minutes while I read a brief statement and give attention to it. Our Ambassador to Belgium has this to say:

> If you think Europe is a howling hell now, there are no words in the English language adequate to describe what it will be next winter unless something is done about it.

That is what he told newspapermen, and outside of this statement he had no definite suggestion except to say that he was on his way to America, where he would tell people what he had seen and thought, and his thought was:

> You cannot look at 8,000,000 starving people without doing something about it.

This bill, in my opinion, stands on its own merits and is aimed primarily to bring refugee children from the war-stricken parts of Europe over to this country, but I believe that we must eventually go much further. During the World War we fed all of Belgium. Can we, the Congress of the United States and the American people, wash our hands of the appalling famine situation in these stricken countries? Can we sit quiet and let millions of European children starve to death in France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Poland?

Can we do that this winter when our granaries are glutted and bursting with food, when we have surplusage in wheat and corn and all kinds of foodstuffs, meat, and pork? Certainly that is not the American way if we can prevent this mass starvation of women and children without injuring our peace or our own food supply. We should help these suffering nations and prevent starvation not only in Belgium, but in the rest of war-ravaged Europe. I believe this is the first step, merely, bringing a limited number of refugee children over here, but that the biggest step is to prevent millions of European women and children from starving this winter. I deny that this would help Germany or the German Army. We sent 700 ships abroad to help Belgium relief in the last war, and Mr. Hoover said not one pound of those foodstuffs went to the German Army. We may be called upon to feed these starving children and women in France and Belgium, and possibly other countries, as we did from 1915 to 1920.

We can set up an American commission. We can see to it that none of this food gets into the hands of the German Army. I say to you this is the American way; this is the humane way; this is the only way that we can prevent starvation in western Europe at the present time. We have a tremendous surplus of food supplies and I hope the Congress will do the generous thing and the big thing when the time comes for proper and adequate legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. I know the gentleman will be pleased to know that a resolution I introduced today at the opening of the House provides just what he has stated.

Mr. FISH. Well, I believe that time has come and I hope the gentleman will press the resolution. I will support it in every possible way from now until it is enacted into law. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I am going to recite something familiar to you:

> Between the dark and the daylight, when the night is beginning to lower,
> Comes the pause in the day's occupations that is known as the children's hour.

The children's hour in England, alas, is fraught with the greatest peril. Gone is the deep sense of happiness and contentment found in family life. The parents of English children are occupied day and night with the defense of their country. Added to this tremendous responsibility is the dreadful knowledge that their children will be forced to endure with them the threatened horrors of a Nazi "blitzkrieg." Parents throughout the world will admit that recognition of this factor alone must require all the courage the English can summon.

There is no time to lose.

Imagine for one moment the Heinkels, the Junkers, spitting forth their volumes of deadly fire from high altitudes, out of effective range of British antiaircraft guns below. There will be no discrimination as to children. The Nazi huftwaffe will not bother to determine between factory, school, airdrome, orphan asylums, children's homes, and oil dumps. All will be treated alike by death-pregnant Stukas. The threatened destruction of London from above focuses our attention upon the recent destruction of Rotterdam, in which 54 Dorniers, Junkers, and Heinkels killed 30,000 people and reduced the center of the city to rubble in 7½ minutes. But, instead of 54 planes, there may be 1,500 or more planes over London, Liverpool, and other thickly populated sections of England. Hitler is reported to have threatened to send over England ten to fifteen thousand death-dealing sky wolves. Before that day comes, let us hasten the passage of the bill providing for these mercy ships for children.

All that this bill does is to provide an exception to the Neutrality Act, an exception which we have already provided for other mercy ships, which we call Red Cross ships. Section 4 of the Neutrality Act says that Red Cross ships can proceed to and through combat zones under safe conduct. We have even gone so far as to take out the words "safe conduct" by a recent amendment about 3 weeks ago with reference to section 4. But I feel that safe conduct should be provided for these mercy ships for children to reduce the possibility of war involvement.

I will say that Mussolini and Hitler would not dare refuse safe conduct under those conditions. They have been condemned in the court of public opinion for many other things, but as to this, the rescue of children in this merciful fashion, I am quite sure that there will be no denial of that safe conduct as a condition precedent to the proceeding of these ships to this rescue work.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Is there any other pledge made by Hitler and Mussolini, or by either of them, that they have not broken when it suited their pleasure or their supposed advantage to break or disregard? What real assurance have you?

Mr. CELLER. You have no assurance.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Do we want to invite the bringing in of refugee children in American ships depending merely upon the assurance or pledge of safe conduct by men whose pledged word has been broken on every occasion? For my part, I am not willing to assume the responsibility of encouraging such a risk.

Mr. CELLER. I am willing to take that chance. The record must be made clear. There is some danger that those men will not keep their plighted word. They may refuse to continue that safe conduct, but I doubt whether they will do that. They would not risk condemnation in the world court of public opinion. I am sure that they will give safe conduct, and that we need not offer unnecessary alarms in that regard.

British children, and children of other nations who have sought refuge there must, in the name of humanity, be brought to safety.

I and one of my colleagues the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] offered a bill amending the Neutrality Act so as to permit the sending of American ships for this purpose. A composite bill has been recommended by the Foreign Affairs Committee, and is now pending before you in the House. More than 200,000 British families have registered their children with the children's overseas reception committee in London. Funds are available for the payment of passage for these unfortunate victims of Nazi hate. Funds will be available for the poor children as well. Machinery has been set up for the selection and the sending of these children to us.

As the situation now prevails, there are no ships available in England that could be used to rescue these children from Nazi Stukas and bombers. Practically all of England's naval strength is engaged in the coastal defense of the island and in an active blockade, which is another form of defense.

To send our ships which are now lying idle is an act of sheer mercy—the *n*th degree of humanity—to save and spare these helpless children from a Nazi holocaust. We have the means—transports and funds. Dare we refuse? I think it would be a blot upon our national escutcheon which would remain forever.

In a short space of time many millions of dollars have been made available in the United States for the housing and care of these children. Organizations sponsored by highly reputable citizens have been organized to undertake the problem of the adequate attention these hapless refugees will require. Responsible groups in more than a score of States are ready and waiting to accomplish the task. Thousands of homes in America are willing to open their doors to these unfortunate children.

The United States Government is not asked to assume any risk or cost. All that is requested is that the barrier now existing will be removed, so that United States citizens will be permitted to evacuate and receive these children.

In the bill that I offered and in the bill reported favorably by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, no attempt is made to strike at or whittle away the provisions of the Neutrality Act. The act remains unimpaired. Simply another section is added thereto. I refer to the so-called Red Cross section, 4, of the Neutrality Act, which permits an exception to the general prohibitions contained therein, in that American Red Cross ships, proceeding under the consent and so-called safe conduct of the belligerent nations, may enter combat areas.

The bill I offered and the bill which has been reported favorably would permit the transportation by vessels of United States registry in ballast, unarmed, and not under convoy, of refugee children not over the age of 12 years fleeing from war zones, together with such officials and adult personnel in charge as are members or employees of suitable and well-recognized organizations approved and certified by the Secretary of State, if such vessel is proceeding under safe conduct granted by all of the states named in the proclamations issued by the President and provided further that each such vessel has painted prominently, distinctly, and unmistakably on each side thereof an American flag and a statement that such vessel is a refugee-child rescue ship of the United States or under United States registry, so that night or day there can be no mistake as to the identity of such vessels.

You will note that safe conduct is necessary; that is, if children are to be rescued out of England and ships are to operate from British ports, and as Italy and Germany are belligerents, consent must be first obtained from these nations that the ships may proceed to the United States with these child cargoes. This should minimize the danger of such conveyance. Furthermore, only those organizations which have been certified by the Secretary of State may arrange for transportation. This would limit this work to well-financed and reputable groups. With these ships flying the American flag and plainly marked as to their missions, Nazi bombers from above or submarines would not dare bomb or torpedo ships of this character. Such vessels unmistakably marked as are the Red Cross ships should lead to no danger or casualties. They could plainly be painted with the American flag and high letters could identify them as rescue ships.

Electric lights at night could be used to mark them as mercy ships. The Nazis would not dare fire upon them. There is no danger therefore of war involvement. There is no British war propaganda connected with my bill. The saving from slaughter is not limited to British children. Infants of all nationals, Belgian, French, Dutch, German, even Italian and Irish, may be saved from death. Furthermore, there is no limitation in the bill as to German children. The Lord only knows what course this war will take. The time may not be very far distant when German children will likewise be imperiled. This bill would permit their rescue.

Thousands of homes in America are now available for these unfortunate children. Scores of committees and organizations will supply all necessary funds. Let us start the ships on errands of mercy at once. There will be no distinction as to wealth, creed, color, or nationality.

There are a number of ships of the United States Lines, now idle, which could readily be used, including the Washington and the Manhattan. Both these ships contemplate tours along our coastal regions. They could easily be diverted in this humanitarian cause. I have just received an invitation to voyage from Virginia to New York on the new United States liner America. This is one of our best, fastest, and most luxurious liners built in the United States. This ship, likewise, could enter such rescue service.

The ruthless slaughter of English children must be averted. The State Department has removed the last vestige of formality in order to have English, as well as any Belgian, Dutch, or other child refugees now in England brought to this country, in order to save them from the widely advertised Nazi reign of terror. These children may now enter as immigrants or as visitors.

Furthermore, the administration, with a deep sense of the humanities involved, has made it unnecessary to require, in each individual instance, an affidavit of support from a relative or a friend of each child. The corporate form of affidavit has now been approved, so that a responsible charitable organization, such as the United States Committee for the Care of European Children, may now guarantee the support of as many children as their funds permit. Therefore, children without friends or relatives in this country shall be assured of support while they remain here.

The Nazi Heinkels will not discriminate, and children will be struck down by the thousands. Such wholesale slaughter is unthinkable. We have a paramount duty to evacuate these English children, as well as the children of any other nation, who have sought refuge in England. This should be done as quickly as possible. Thousands of Americans have offered their homes and over 500 institutions have signified their willingness to care for these unfortunates.

We must all realize the horrible effects of war upon children. We know from experience that children who have been through war are no longer children. Their emotional systems are so severely shocked that it takes years for them to recover.

Only the most thick-skinned isolationist could refuse to support a bill of this character. A Gallup poll recently showed that 6,000,000 families in the United States stood ready to shelter these young unfortunates for the duration of the war. In 1 week, 20,000 inquiries were received, and they continued to arrive at the rate of 500 per day.

Of course, absolute safety for these children, either now in Great Britain or even on the high seas is not assurable. It is a question of comparable danger. In Great Britain at the present time danger hangs over the head of every child every time a Nazi bomber approaches. In American ships which have been properly identified, both night and day, sailing a well-known course given in advance to the Germans, the danger should be negligible. Even Adolf Hitler, with all his ferocity, would not dare sink a shipload of children, even if he could stupidly believe there would be a military or naval advantage gained thereby. The conclusion, even to that scoundrel, must be that the sinking of such a ship would be likely to infuriate a nation. It may be that securing so-called safe conduct from Germany and Italy may be difficult, but, easy or arduous, the attempt must be made. Italy and Germany would be eternally damned if they refuse.

Frankly, I am one of those who believe ships should be sent whether safe conduct is given or refused. Again I say Hitler or Mussolini would not dare strike at these ships carrying helpless children. Frankly, public opinion in the country wants these ships to go on this errand of mercy, regardless. As a matter of fact, when difficulty was experienced in securing safe conduct for Red Cross ships, we immediately amended the Neutrality Act so that Red Cross ships are permitted to go on their missions of rescue and salvation without safe conduct.

Curiously enough, when hearings were held before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, the chairman, the gentleman from New York, Congressman BLOOM, read a report that our Ambassador to Great Britain, the Honorable Joseph P. Kennedy, opposed the sending of United States vessels for these child evacuees. The chairman espoused the alleged objection of Ambassador Kennedy. Fortunately, there was present at the hearing Mr. Marshall Field, chairman of the United States Committee for the Care of European Children, and he promptly stated that such report of such objection by Kennedy was an utter misrepresentation and untrue. He gave as his authority for that statement no less a personage than the Honorable Sumner Welles, Under Secretary of State. At the hearings, questions were raised concerning Prime Minister Churchill's statement in the House of Commons a week or so ago. Efforts were made thereby to discourage the passage of this measure of child rescue. In that regard, I read from an editorial appearing in the New York Times:

Mr. Churchill characterized plans for the wholesale evacuation of British children as most undesirable. He believed that such plans, put forward in Great Britain and requiring the use of British ships and convoys, reflected a state of panic detrimental to the interests of national defense.

But he added that an American movement to take the children out of danger would immediately engage the most earnest consideration of His Majesty's Government. There can be no other conclusion than that the British Government is willing to let us evacuate in American ships those children whose parents wish them to go, though it is reluctant to risk them on British ships, unable to detach warships to give them adequate protection, and probably hesitant to push the plan, on its own initiative, because such action might be regarded as defeatism.

It is not for us to advise the British Government. What we can do is to offer such facilities as the Government and people of Great Britain are ready to use. The safest way—indeed, the only reasonably safe way—of getting refugee children out of Great Britain is to take them on American ships, lighted at night and beflagged by day so as to make a mistake as to their identity impossible.

Furthermore, it has been stated that no amendment to the Neutrality Act is necessary that the so-called mercy ships may proceed to a belligerent nation to evacuate refugee children. I have examined carefully the Neutrality Act and come to no such conclusion. It is argued in some quarters that the Neutrality Act gives the President the right to define a combat area and that it would be unlawful "except under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, for any citizens of the United States or any American vessel to proceed into or through any such combat area."

But this means that the President can issue a general regulation to permit an American vessel into or through the combat zone and do anything consistent with the rules and regulations promulgated by the President. It is argued that the President could issue such a rule and refugee children could be evacuated.

In the first place, Congress never intended such a tremendous burden to be placed upon the President. Suppose the President were disinclined to issue such a rule or regulation. Congress never intended placing the matter squarely upon the President. Congress, therefore, should assume this burden itself. The President has not acted up to this juncture. If he clearly had such a power or thought he had such a power, we may infer from his inaction that he lacks the power. He, therefore, puts action squarely up to Congress. In passing the Neutrality Act, Congress did not contemplate the evacuation of children. Scan the debates and you will find no mention thereof. Only a few weeks ago, we amended the Neutrality Act and again, by inference, reaffirmed these conclusions. In any event, there should be no doubt as to who has the authority. We should cut the Gordian knot of doubt right now. The bill now before the House and a similar bill now before the Senate should be passed expeditiously. Failure to pass this act would be a confession of our inability to rescue these innocents. It would be an inexcusable failure. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes, the balance of my time, to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is most laudable. We must realize, however, that its enactment is fraught with many implications. This is the first amendment to our neutrality law, which would change the principle of that law.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I only have 5 minutes. The gentleman is a member of the committee and will have plenty of time. He possibly refers to the Red Cross ships. The Red Cross is an institution and I do not consider this bill in the same class. If I vote for this bill, I am not voting without some appreciation of what I am doing. We cannot settle a question like this by reciting poetry from the Well of the House. We should not settle this question that might put us into war on the basis of sympathy alone. Every instinct within us impels us to vote for anything that would help the children of these stricken lands. If this bill becomes law, we are authorizing a mercy ship, so-called, to go into belligerent waters under the American flag, provided it has been promised safe conduct by the several belligerent nations. Now, assume that all these nations should grant consent, assume that they should all keep their word, assume that the mercy ship should be blown up or destroyed by a floating mine—a pure accident. England has lost ships, Belgium has lost ships, Germany has lost ships during this conflict by virtue of the exploding of their own mines—not intentional, of course, but accidents.

Now this floating-mine danger lurks in the path of every ship plying the waters near and about these belligerent countries. What would happen if one of these mercy ships, laden with its cargo of precious refugee English children, should be sunk or destroyed, even by one of these floating mines? It is not difficult to imagine what would happen in the United States. The news would be broadcast over the radio and through the press. Our people would be not only shocked, grieved, and depressed but they would be belligerent at once. It would be no easy task to convince an already hysterical, wrought-up, and exasperated people that the explosion was not brought about through German treachery.

I think we are all agreed that there is an overwhelming sentiment in America favorable to the Allies or England at this time. This is because of the ruthless Hitler way of doing things. I do not want this country to get into this European war, yet I realize that there are many in the land who at this good hour feel that duty requires our immediate entry. On the other hand, there are many who do not want to enter the war but whose feelings would be so aroused, if one of these mercy ships should be so destroyed, that it would be almost impossible to keep this country out of the conflict. It does not take any stretch of the imagination to visualize just such a condition and therefore sound reasoning must suggest the inherent dangers in a bill of this kind. The neutrality law has kept our ships out of belligerent waters, and as a result we have avoided incidents which lead to war.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] made a splendid speech. He told how we ought to take care of these children and said we ought to keep all the peoples of Europe from starving this year. That is fine idealism and sentiment. That is not the question before us today, however. As suggested by the gentleman from New York, this is the opening wedge; this is the first step; and just so surely as we are here it follows naturally that this legislation is the forerunner of similar legislation which, if carried far enough, will inevitably get us into the conflict unless we are almighty careful. Now is the time to stop and to look and to listen. Let us not be controlled entirely by what we would like to do.

All children coming on these mercy ships will come under the immigration quota law. There is no way of guessing the number involved. That will depend entirely upon the generosity of American citizens who provide homes for these children, plus the generosity and activity of these refugee children organizations that arrange the details in connection with bringing the children to this country. We must not forget that in time this legislation may bring large numbers of children to our shores and, after the war is over in Europe, we may be confronted with another problem. Of course, the same sentiment that prompts us in bringing the children to our country now will prevent us from returning them to the land from whence they came, unless conditions over yonder are as good as they are in this country at that time. I am not finding any fault about this, but am simply pointing out what will happen. We all realize that this is the situation.

Now, this bill is before us today because of the activity of those refugee organizations interested at this time in children residing in England. While we all want to help those children, we must not forget that the children in Norway, Holland, Sweden, France, and other over-run countries, parts of which are now being bombed, also appeal to the sympathy of our people. We should like to give aid and succor to all of them but, being realists, we know that this cannot happen. At the most, we can give but little assistance in this, the hour of peril for the children of Europe. It is very difficult to vote against a bill of this kind, and there will be few, if any, votes against it in the House. Nevertheless, the Congress is approaching the time when sentiment cannot possibly control and when we must use our minds as well as yield to our sympathetic impulses. It is not pleasant to address the House in this vein, and, believe me, I would not be doing so if I did not feel that it was a duty. It is so easy to have one's motives misconstrued in these days. While this bill will undoubtedly become a law, I am doubtful of its efficacy so far as actual results are concerned. At least it is a humanitarian, sentimental gesture in keeping with our American ideals. If it does become law and is put into operation, then the most we can do is to hope that none of the things I have suggested might happen to these mercy ships will happen. [Applause.]

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to call the attention of the House to the provision on page 2 requiring an American flag to be painted on each side of the ship. In my opinion this is not sufficient. I feel it is quite as necessary that an American flag or some equally plain identifying mark be painted on the superstructure of the ship to be clearly visible from the air. I propose to offer an amendment providing that this further identifying mark be added to the flags on the sides. I think this should be done in order that airplanes flying over such a ship may see clearly what ship it is.

When I returned from Sweden on the Kungsholm, even so early in the war as that, they had a great Swedish flag painted on the superstructure of the ship so there could be no mistake. This ought to be done in the case of these refugee ships, and unless someone else desires to offer the amendment I suggest, I shall certainly do so.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, if the Members will bear with me for the short time allotted to me I should like to make a statement undertaking in as simple terms as I am capable to point out that this bill is a simple measure and does not involve many of the complex aspects which have been raised by some of the questions presented here by the membership.

This measure is an amendment to the Neutrality Act of 1939. It is an amendment which undertakes to provide that certain very simple things be done: Namely, that section 4 of this act shall not prohibit the transportation by vessels in ballast unarmed and not under convoy, of refugee children under 16 years of age fleeing war zones, together with such necessary adult personnel in charge as may be approved by the Secretary of State.

In undertaking to answer some of the arguments raised here this afternoon I certainly do not want to impugn either the courage, the patriotism, or the good faith of any Member of this body. If those gentlemen who seriously urge with some reason, perhaps, that a measure of this kind might project the American people into war because of the attack on and the sinking of one of these vessels bearing its precious burden of children, I would say that in many ways the beginning of the break-down in democracy is the failure of those undertaking to speak for the people to trust democracy. Are we going to say that we, the Congress, are so parsimonious, so timorous that when given an opportunity by a simple change in a law to meet a cruel emergency which I am satisfied was not contemplated when the law was enacted, are we to say that because of the possibility of some disaster overtaking these children on the high seas that we prefer to have them bombed and gunned to death like rats in the alleys of London or Birmingham because of a remote chance of disaster on the high seas, even under the safe conduct of the belligerents? Are we to say that the American people who have already spoken upon this measure are not to be trusted? That if because of some tragedy or unforeseen circumstances one of these ships were to meet disaster the people would immediately and by that cause alone be impelled to enter the European conflict?

Mr. Speaker, I believe you do discredit to the good sense and to the temper of the American people. It has been suggested this amendment will result in there being a number of British adult persons brought over to the United States. It has also been suggested that there may be a great strain placed upon the Government budget or upon the relief rolls because of these helpless children being brought to our shores. This measure specifically provides that the adult personnel to accompany the children on the vessels shall be under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of State. I may say to the House that into my own office within the past 3 weeks there have presented themselves a dozen American women who are willing to volunteer their services to go aboard these boats. I may also say that the Seamen's Union of America has volunteered to man one of these ships without one cent of compensation. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have a high regard for the opinion, the judgment, and good faith of the membership of this House, but if hundreds of thousands of people in this country are willing to contribute of their services, are willing to take the children into their homes—and there are many thousands of homes now on record that are willing to undertake this responsibility—is the Congress of the United States going to stand supinely and callously by, indifferent to this public demand, when the American people want action? Are we going to say that because of some fancied or possibly real, but, I think, remote, danger of our being carried into the war they should not be permitted to do this? I do not think so.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman speaks of hundreds of thousands of homes. Does the gentleman contemplate that more than the immigration quota from any country shall be admitted under the provisions of his bill?

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not believe the gentleman was present when the question was presented earlier in the debate.

Mr. TARVER. Perhaps I was not.

Mr. HENNINGS. This does not so contemplate.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. May I say this has nothing to do with the quota law. These children are brought in here temporarily and after the emergency returned to their homes.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Attorney General has passed upon this matter.

Mr. TARVER. I am sorry I did not hear the other discussion. The gentleman says they are to be brought here temporarily.

Mr. HENNINGS. They are to be brought here under visitors' visas.

Mr. TARVER. They may come here under circumstances under which they can never be returned. Does the gentleman contemplate bringing in here hundreds of thousands of children, perhaps a million or more children, from the war zone into this country?

Mr. HENNINGS. The gentleman's question is well taken, and I will undertake to answer it.

This contemplates no change whatever in the immigration laws. These children come in under visitors' permits or visas. Assuming, as has been suggested, that a hundred thousand do come in, the plan of the committee, of which Marshall Field 3d is now chairman, for the care of refugee European children is as follows: It has on file and on record the names of thousands of people in this country who have made a showing as to their stability and their ability to maintain these children at their own expense, and they have been found upon investigation by this committee to be competent to take these children into their homes, not for adoption but as visitors. They must post a bond and they must go through the necessary requirements. No change is being made in any of our immigration or naturalization laws or processes. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. TARVER. Only partially, because it seems to me that the gentleman's plan might result in many hundreds of thousands of children being brought here who could never be returned. Notwithstanding the law might contemplate their return, physical circumstances might make their return impossible.

Mr. HENNINGS. Does the gentleman realize that the child-welfare agencies' reports show that in this country there are something like four times as many homes wanting children as there are children available for adoption?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman intimated that these children would not come within the immigration quota but under the visitor section of the immigration law. If that be so, I am wondering how they are going to come here because only 2 weeks ago I called the State Department in an attempt to bring over here for a visit my mother-in-law's sister, who now resides in England. The State Department informed me that visitors' visas will not be issued because a showing cannot be made that at the expiration of the date of the visitor's visa they will be able to return to the country from which they came. I told them that I saw in the headlines of the paper a few days ago where Baron Rothschild and his wife came to the United States on a visitor's passport with a satchel containing a million dollars' worth of jewels. The State Department then "passed the buck" and said that the Rothschilds must have been issued visitors' passports by an American consul.

If the State Department correctly informed me only a week ago that they would not issue a visitor's visa to an English citizen to come over here under a visitor's passport because they could not make a showing that when the passport expires they can return to England, how can they, under that interpretation, issue a visitor's passport or visa to the children covered in this bill?

Mr. HENNINGS. I may say to the gentleman that I would not undertake as an expert to interpret the rulings of the Department of State or the Bureau of Immigration, but I do know that these children, before they can be received, must have the proper clearance. Of course, you realize it is a technical matter to some extent in England, as well as the assurances made over here to the proper authorities that they will not become public charges and will not under any circumstances form a part of those people now on the relief rolls.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. With reference to the public-charge matter, from newspaper accounts in my city and in other cities, we find that the only guaranty they will not become a public charge is the putting up of a $50 bond, while an American-born citizen World War veteran, whom I have in mind, who has been trying to get his wife over from Italy to take care of his five children, cannot bring her over here because he cannot show sufficient income that she will not become a public charge. He is required to prove that he has an income of around $2,000 a year and post a $1,000 bond that she will not become a public charge.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. KITCHENS. Does not the gentleman feel that this bill is an absolutely futile gesture, for the reason that Germany claims that England is trying to starve her children and Germany would never in this world consent for any children or women to be moved out of England, because those women and children and the women and children of other peaceful countries have been the special objects of attack and murder by Germany and some other countries?

Mr. HENNINGS. I may say to the gentleman that I do not. There are many competent and authorized groups, for example, the Society of Friends, the Quakers, who have been successful in obtaining some assurances and understandings with the German Government in other relief instances. Those of us who are interested in the passage of this resolution feel this will not be a futile gesture, but if it should unfortunately come to pass that it is a futile gesture, let us make the gesture by removing the barrier which now exists.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Just how are these refugee children to be selected and what is a refugee child as contemplated by the bill?

Mr. HENNINGS. I may say to the gentleman that I have no detailed knowledge of the manner in which they are to be selected, but I will say that that is being done entirely in England.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Let us assume that we have hundreds of thousands of children—this bill is not limited to English children——

Mr. HENNINGS. That is true.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The bill is a blanket form of bill, and any child from any country may apply to come under the provisions of this law, if enacted.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is right.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What I am trying to get at is by what means are we to determine who has a right to come and who has not?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10213) to permit American vessels to assist in the evacuation from the war zones of certain refugee children.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the courteous gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the author of this measure, has done an enormous amount of work on this measure and in this morning's Post there was an editorial speaking of him and praising his bill. Two other newspapers have spoken of our able colleague as a great humanitarian.

I ask unanimous consent that that editorial may be inserted as a part of my remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Aug. 7, 1940]

SAVE THE CHILDREN

The Hennings bill authorizing the use of American ships to transport child refugees from the European war zones will come up for debate today in the House under a special arrangement by the Rules Committee. Little opposition to passage of the bill is anticipated, and indeed it is difficult to understand why there should be any opposition at all.

There is probably no other question relating to Europe on which American sentiment is so nearly unanimous as on the justice and propriety of saving as many young children as possible from the horrors and perils of total war.

Many isolationists in Congress have promised to support the Hennings bill. They can do so with logic and consistency, since the broad question of neutrality is in nowise involved. However, American ships are now forbidden under the Neutrality Act to enter waters which have been defined by the President as part of the combat area. The Hennings bill would not repeal this provision; it would merely exempt ships in ballast, unarmed and without convoy, sent for the express purpose of removing war refugees under 16 years of age.

This exemption would become operative only if such ships were guaranteed safe conduct by all the belligerents. Representatives of those war-relief agencies to whom the task of organizing and supervising the transportation of refugees would logically fall are confident that such guaranties will be given by the Germans. It is, therefore, imperative that the Hennings bill be passed promptly so that the evacuations can get under way before it is too late.

Immediate plans contemplate only the transportation of British children who have been registered for evacuation by their parents. But the Hennings bill would also legalize the transportation in American ships of child war refugees from the continent, whence rumors come daily of an even more terrible scourge than war itself. It is hoped that the Germans, now faced with the possibility of famine and plague in the occupied territories, will consent to such evacuations and also that the British will permit the rescue ships to pass through their blockade.

Surely, all who continue to set value on human life and on the mitigation of human suffering, or even upon the preservation of the human species, will want this bill enacted without further delay.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10213) to permit American vessels to assist in the evacuation from the war zones of certain refugee children, with Mr. MCGRANERY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. The gentleman is making a good speech and I want him to continue in the same vein. [Applause.]

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted me today, and before proceeding to discuss the subject matter at hand, I want to take opportunity to commend the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM], for the expedition which has characterized the progress of this important emergency measure, enabling the membership to have it presented for consideration a little over 2 weeks following the day of its introduction in the House. I would be remiss were I not also, on behalf of the many Members who have expressed to me and to others their interest in this proposed amendment to the Neutrality Act, to say here that the distinguished ranking minority member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], has also, in his capacity as a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, as well as ranking minority member of the Committee on Rules, assisted in every possible manner. These gentlemen, as well as the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Rules, have realized that this measure is one in which party politics should have no part, and that the all-important humane policy involved transcends narrow partisanship and is consonant with our humane and democratic ideals as a nation.

Last November, supported by an overwhelming majority of public opinion, the Congress passed the Neutrality Act of 1939. Its primary purpose was, insofar as it is humanly possible, to prevent the entrance of the United States into this or any other war. I believe we all understand that any legislation which seeks to establish rules governing the conduct of the United States in the face of unpredictable events must be flexible. It must, of necessity, repose judgment and discretion in the officers of our Government whose duty it is to enforce such laws and to take into account changing conditions and circumstances.

We here in Congress enacted the Neutrality Act of 1939, which law is now in force. This act made articulate the firm resolve of the people of the United States to remain at peace. To avoid at all costs, save that of our national honor and safety, any involvement in European or Asiatic wars. I know that you, as Members of Congress, are thoroughly familiar with our Neutrality Act, and I do not propose to go into a detailed discussion of it now. I want to attempt to explain, as clearly as I can, just what change in this law we are undertaking to propose by offering this amendment to section 4 of the act. Now, I want also to tell you why I believe this amendment should be enacted into law and to give you the reasons for my firm conviction that if this is done the United States will be able to continue to serve humanity in its highest capacity, as the one great nation in the world which has always been a haven of refuge for the weak and oppressed of all peoples, regardless of their nationality and political or religious beliefs. This is an expression in highest terms of our right as a nation to exist.

We all know that our people want to be permitted, through voluntary action, to give temporary homes to thousands of helpless children who are today confined in the temporary fortress of Great Britain. We all know that our people want to shelter them and care for them under peaceful American skies, and at the same time to do this legally, with all possible assurance of safety to these children and with no risk of our becoming involved in war.

At the present time no American citizen, no matter how much he may wish to do so, may send for a child from the British Isles. This is because there is contained in our Neutrality Act a provision which gives the President authority to define what is known as combat areas, and forbids any American citizen or ship to proceed into or through any such combat areas. Of course, the waters surrounding Great Britain have been declared by the President to be such a combat area under the authority given him. We have now embraced in the act an exception to this provision relating to combat areas, permitting Red Cross ships, under assurances of safe conduct, to take Red Cross workers, doctors, medical supplies, food, and clothing into the war zone for the relief of human suffering. This section now needs immediate amendment to permit also the bringing of children from places of danger into the United States. I do not think there is any difference between the relief of civilian suffering and the saving of children's lives as a matter of human principle. Our Neutrality Act was never intended to prevent such measures of mercy.

There has been some discussion about this business of permitting our own ships to go abroad to bring these children back, and the question has been raised as to why England cannot herself do this. The fact of the matter is that British ships are not available, nor are British war vessels available to convoy them. Since the closing of the Mediterranean and the collapse of France, it is estimated that England, in order to sustain lives on the British Isles and to maintain their defense, now requires three ships to do the work done by one before. England is using every available ship, including pleasure craft, in her back-to-the-wall fight for life. Even if British ships were available, they would of necessity fly the British flag and, whether under convoy or not, would be subject to attack and possible destruction.

The permissive amendment proposed in H. R. 10213 is simple and easily understood. It provides that to do this job the section of the Neutrality Act forbidding entrance of American ships into danger zones be liberalized, as was done in the case of the Red Cross ships, and that American vessels unarmed and not under convoy be permitted to enter into such zones for the purpose of transporting, from any countries, refugee children under 16 years of age who are fleeing from war zones, provided such vessel is proceeding under safe conduct granted by all of the states now classed as belligerents.

This does not mean that the Government of the United States, on its own responsibility or at cost to the taxpayers of this country, proposes to send our ships to England or any other place. It does mean that generous and charitably disposed individuals and groups may, upon their own initiative, charter American vessels for this purpose. It does not mean that we are going to change or alter our immigration laws. It does mean that these children are to be allowed to enter this country as visitors under visitors' permits and not as immigrants under the immigration quotas.

This proposed amendment provides further that these American ships are to have painted distinctly and unmistakably on each side an American flag and the statement that such vessel is a refugee children's ship of the United States, and they are to be fully lighted by night so that there can be no mistake as to their identity.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. In answer to the question propounded to the gentleman a moment ago as to how these children were to be selected, I wish to state, and I am sure the gentleman will agree with me, there is a committee known as the Children's Overseas Reception Bureau in London, presided over by Geoffrey Shakespeare, who is a member of the Cabinet. This bureau determines who shall come, and with the bureau there has already been registered 200,000 British families who have children to be evacuated.

Mr. HENNINGS. Exactly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a question?

Mr. HENNINGS. I will be glad to yield to my colleague.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Following the suggestion that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] has made that the selection is to be made by authorities in some other country, does not the gentleman feel that those who are going to be our guests should be determined by our own authorities instead of giving that authority to some other country?

Mr. HENNINGS. In answer to the gentleman, I may say that we have not any legally constituted authority that would undertake to go over to England and select children to come over here.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But we do have the right to say who shall come.

Mr. HENNINGS. We have to trust the British people and their duly organized committees and agencies. I think that is immaterial anyway.

Mr. O'CONNOR. We do have the right to say who shall come here and who shall not.

Mr. HENNINGS. Naturally.

Mr. Chairman, if the membership will indulge me for a few moments, I shall make a brief statement of the purposes of the bill. There are many things about this measure, because it is an important measure involving policy which should be cleared up. I am sure that the advocates of the bill, and its proponents, do not want the House to pass a bill simply upon humanitarian grounds, without a clear concept of its purpose and its terms, and the far-reaching effect of any of its provisions.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes.

Mr. TABER. My understanding is that it is suggested that these youngsters be brought in here under visitors' visas, with the idea that they are going back. Has the gentleman figured, or has the House or the Congress figured, on whether we are doing these children a good turn or a bad turn in bringing them here, when after a certain period of time—a year or so—they are expected to go back, when we do not know whether they can go back or not.

Mr. HENNINGS. I might say to the gentleman that in undertaking to answer his question I think we are certainly doing them a good turn by bringing them here, if we are going to save them from the wrath of German stukas. Moreover, we are not undertaking to bring them here unless their mothers and fathers and those responsible for them want them to come.

In the third place, we are not going to undertake to bring them here unless public-spirited citizens in the United States, in every State, not just the State of New York, undertake to pay the passage of these children, and to take care of them after they arrive. The decision rests with the English and with the mothers and fathers of the children. I think the Congress of the United States might yield to the mothers and fathers of these children the simple concession that they know what is best for their own children.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes.

Mr. TABER. My understanding is that the authorities of this country feel that few families can be trusted with that kind of responsibility toward children of no kin to them, and that rules and regulations and inspections must be set up under the authority of the Labor Department.

Mr. HENNINGS. And I may say that my information is directly contrary to the gentleman's.

Mr. TABER. I would say to the gentleman that my information is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. I cannot yield further. I should be glad to go into that later.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENNINGS. For a short question.

Mr. WALTER. Has any assurance been given the Government that the safe passage of these boats will be guaranteed?

Mr. HENNINGS. That is one of the terms of the bill.

Mr. WALTER. I understand that, but I am wondering whether or not any assurance has been given that these nations will look favorably on this legislation.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not think the Congress of the United States has been in the habit generally, in passing legislation, to consider whether foreign nations will view it favorably or unfavorably. I do know that the British Parliament, if we are to judge its temper by the expressions of the members of that body, are hoping that these children will be given some means by which they can escape what may be and probably is in store for many of them.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARNES. Are these children coming in under visitors' visas or under the quota?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to say to the gentleman they are coming in under visitors' visas. I did not understand whether the gentleman heard the previous discussion of the bill.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Is it the gentleman's judgment as a lawyer and constitutional authority that the President has this power whether we pass this bill or not?

Mr. HENNINGS. I happen to be a lawyer, but I do not pose as a constitutional authority. There seems to be grave doubt as to whether the President has or has not, under the act at the present time.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. The gentleman from Missouri has just disclaimed the fact that he was a constitutional authority. I want to say as one who has served with him upon the Foreign Affairs Committee that the gentleman from Missouri is not only a lawyer, but a splendid lawyer. Furthermore, I want to take this opportunity to express my deep regret that the gentleman from Missouri, the author of this bill, is voluntarily retiring from the House at the expiration of this term. I want to say that his retirement is a distinct loss to the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Nation and to the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I simply want to take a moment to second the motion of my colleague from Texas.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me to concur in that statement most heartily, as a fellow member of the Foreign Affairs Committee?

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BARTON of New York. I would like to ask the ranking majority member whether in his opinion the President has the power to send these ships, whether this legislation is enacted or not?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I do not know. I doubt whether he has. Some take the position that he might have, but I think it is doubtful, and I think that as long as the neutrality law is concerned the President should not exercise the authority unless the Congress gave him the right to exercise it. I think the neutrality law should be rigidly enforced. I think that the mandate should come from the Congress and that the President should not stretch the neutrality law, but that its interpretation should be placed by Congress. That is the reason why I think this act should be passed.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. I just wanted to say in answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON] that the President's statement made the other day answers that statement conclusively.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTON of New York. I sometimes get a little behind in my reading of the President's statements. I wonder if the gentleman could tell us what that statement was?

Mr. BLOOM. I shall be pleased to read that statement when the time comes. I have it here.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, the permissive amendment proposed in H. R. 10213 is simple and easily understood. It provides that to do this job the section of the Neutrality Act forbidding the entrance of American ships into danger zones be liberalized, as was done in the case of the Red Cross ships, and that American vessels unarmed and not under convoy be permitted to enter into such zones for the purpose of transporting from any countries refugee children under 16 years of age who are fleeing from war zones.

This does not mean that the Government of the United States on its own responsibility or at cost to the taxpayers of this country proposes to send our ships to England or to any other place. It does mean that generous and charitably disposed individuals and groups may, upon their own initiative, charter American vessels for this purpose. It does not mean that we are going to change or alter our immigration laws. It does mean that these children are to be allowed to enter this country under visitors' permits.

The proposed amendment provides further that these American ships are to have painted distinctly and unmistakably on each side an American flag and the statement that such vessel is a refugee children's ship of the United States. They are to be fully lighted by night so that there can be no mistake as to their identity.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, I think the time so generously given me by the chairman of our committee has been probably better used in undertaking to answer questions which have occurred to the membership than by availing myself of the opportunity to discuss the humane phases of this bill, knowing as I do that every Member of the House is possessed of just as much humanity, good will, and desire to do the right thing as I or any other. I could enlarge at some length upon that phase of the subject.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The language on page 1, line 9, "under 16 years of age, together with such necessary adult personnel in charge as may be approved by the Secretary of State." When these adults come in with these children, what is the machinery for having them returned to their European home at some later time?

Mr. HENNINGS. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that a number of Americans have already offered their services to go on these boats.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And come back with the children?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes. The seamen's union has offered to man one of these boats without pay. As to the others, they would come in under visitors' permits. Not being a member of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, I do not care to undertake to interpret it, but I would say that some could still come in under the quota and remain in this country.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the gentleman understand that this language in any way authorizes the Secretary of State administering this particular language to deviate from the immigration laws under which he must operate?

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not, I may say to the gentleman; and I will say further that the Attorney General has so interpreted it.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Does the gentleman's bill have the approval of the State Department?

Mr. HENNINGS. That question has been asked before. I am not in position to answer whether it has or not. I think this is essentially the responsibility of the Congress.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. It has not expressed any opposition to it.

Mr. HENNINGS. It has not expressed any opposition to it, I can tell the gentleman that.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. EATON. I have here a release from the Department of State dated July 14, 1940, which begins as follows:

> The Department of State and the Department of Justice today announced the adoption of simplified procedure which will make possible the admission of refugee children from the war zone in whatever numbers shipping facilities and private assurances of support will permit.

Mr. HENNINGS. The gentleman is correct. I thank him for his contribution.

Mr. EATON. It is signed by Mr. O'Shaunessy and approved by Mr. Schofield and by Francis Biddle, Acting Attorney General, and it is headed "Department of State."

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. Chairman, the American people have shown in an overwhelming variety of ways that they want not a few, but large numbers of British children brought here for the duration of the war. Nearly every large city in the country has a group who are offering their homes to these children. These offers are coming from homes of every kind. A surprisingly large number come from homes where the family income is barely enough to sustain the household itself. Some offers are coming from homes where the taking of a child will entail personal sacrifice by the members of the family. This is an evidence of the great spirit and heart of the American people. People who are willing to make not just an heroic gesture and to furnish lip service, but who are willing to give up their own comforts and luxuries to give expression to a fine human instinct. The Gallup poll shows that nearly 5,000,000 such homes are eager and willing to care for these children.

In any discussion of this subject, however, I think three things must be borne in mind. First, this is not a movement for rich English children. It is for children—rich and poor alike. The selection of British children for evacuation lies in the hands of the British Government whose policy as expressed in Parliament, provides for absolute impartiality in dealing with the question, without regard to influence or position. That is one thing to remember.

The second thing to remember is that while American citizens are sending for the children in the British Isles, the responsibility for their safety lies primarily in the hands of the British Government which is responsible to the English mothers of these children. The third thing to remember is that all American ships chartered for the purpose of going to the British Isles, or to any other country, should the theater of war change, and bringing the children, must do so under the terms of this amendment, under rules and regulations prescribed by our own Department of State. There can be no haphazard evacuation of the British children.

If you pass this amendment, you simply remove the barrier now existing, in a strict construction of the Neutrality Act, preventing the passage of American ships through combat areas. It is, so to speak, simply and solely an act to enable our own passenger ships, privately chartered and now idle for the most part, to be used in this humanitarian endeavor.

Certainly you, the framers of the Neutrality Act, did not foresee the cruel emergency which now condemns young children to face the terrors of siege without hope of escape. Moreover, these ships are to go over in ballast, carrying no cargo of any kind. The cash-and-carry clause of our neutrality law was intended to avert our possible involvement in war through the sending of an American ship alleged to be carrying contraband. Certainly, children are not, under any construction of the word "contraband."

A few hundred children—children of the rich and of the poor, of soldiers and peers, sailors, seamen, and factory workers, are beginning to arrive. Behind them are 200,000 more who could be loaded immediately on shipboard if there were ships to carry them.

With America aiding, real evacuation is not an impossible task. The greatest need is ships, and this modification of our law will permit some of the many vessels now in our ports to be used.

To do this, I am sure, would involve no breach whatever of real neutrality.

We must not delay—signs multiply that the long-heralded "battle of Britain" is soon to start. The increased tempo of bomb raids is already taking the toll of lives of British children. This is all but a prelude. Whether England repels the thrust or not, the slaughter of innocents will be appalling.

If we have left a particle of our vaunted humanity, of our traditional disregard for the consequences of a charitable deed bravely done, of our time-honored concern for the welfare of innocent victims of political persecution, this House will not hesitate to act, and act now.

This is a move, not to aid England, but of Christian deliverance.

Let us by our act today enable our public-spirited citizens who are willing to give shelter to a few thousand helpless children now caught in the path of a terrible wave of death and destruction not of their own doing.

In this heartbreaking world, millions of Americans are wondering what they can do to uphold the banner of freedom, democracy, and humanity.

This is something that we can do. We can hold the children of British democracy while their father fights for his life. Every child of intelligent British parents who survives in the safety of America may yet become a power in the reestablishment of the democratic ideal around the earth. The world of tomorrow will stand in desperate need of those who have been brought up in a tradition of tolerance and fair play. These British youngsters have in them the breath of better things. They are worth preserving.

The response of our people to the dictates of conscience and humanity has always been characteristic of the best that is in us in times of emergency. Is this not an opportunity for the expression of the best that is in us? [Applause.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. O'DAY].

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Chairman, in urging my colleagues to pass the Hennings bill I feel I am voicing the plea of the majority of women and men in these United States, for since the Committee for Mercy Ships for Children was first organized—and that was only 3 weeks ago—it has been flooded with letters and telegrams from all sections of the country thousands and thousands of them, offering help, money, and homes to the children.

The homes will be supplied and supervised by the United States Committee for the Care of European Children under Marshal Field, in cooperation with Miss Katherine Lenroot and the Children's Bureau. With the Women's Committee for Mercy Ships lies the responsibility of securing American ships in which to transport the 32,000 children whose parents have signified willingness to suffer this temporary separation from them.

Lorld Lothian has said 98 percent of these children are from "free-grant schools," which correspond with our public schools. It is only by means of American funds and ships that they will be able to reach the haven of these United States.

And this haven must be gained. It is unthinkable that little children should be left to suffer and perish should that threatened annihilation overtake their country, when we have ships and money with which to rescue them and fail to do so.

One can realize the anguish of parents who must weigh the relative danger of the perils of an ocean crossing in these fearful times of war and the perils of invasion by a ruthless enemy. If they are willing to trust these most precious of cargoes to our ships and to our care, surely we have the courage to assume any risks that may accrue to our country.

Time is the very essence of safety. The bill should be passed at once. To fail to do so will be a crime against all humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid it is very unfortunate that this bill has been permitted to come before us today for consideration. There seems to be a feeling that it is not necessary. There is danger that we allow our sympathies to run away with our judgments. I am going to vote for the bill, for it is a gesture in the right direction.

Another reason I have for saying that this bill should not come before us for consideration today is because the membership of the Committee on Foreign Affairs—I have talked with several of them—none of them seem to have a very strong conviction that this bill ought to be brought before us. No one from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has spoken.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would remind him that I am a member of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I beg the gentlewoman's pardon; she is a member of that committee, and I have great respect for her judgment in these matters. But I was about to say that to my mind this bill is not necessary either from the standpoint of the Committee on Foreign Affairs or the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, because the President can do now exactly what it is proposed to do by this bill. There is no question about it.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I am sure he wants to have that point cleared up.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; I am glad to yield to my good friend from New York.

Mr. CELLER. If we were so sure, why did we amend section 4 of the Neutrality Act with reference to Red Cross ships? If the President had the authority to send Red Cross ships without convoy, why did we feel it necessary to adopt an amendment permitting them to go? And would not the same argument apply in this case? If the President already had this power, why would we introduce this bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I do not want to agree with what the gentleman says, but I respect his opinion. The authority given the President is very wide. This is the very section that gives him the authority, and especially does it give him authority with reference to humane matters, and there is no limitation.

Mr. CELLER. Why did we amend the Red Cross provision in that regard?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, a distinguished member of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Will not the gentleman agree that the reason that the Red Cross amendment and this one were brought here is twofold—first, the administration does not want the country to know what broad powers were granted under section 3, and, second, they want to have ratification by the Congress before they act?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I am glad for the contribution from both of these gentlemen. They are brilliant lawyers, and their arguments indicate I am right.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Is not the real purpose back of this to throw the responsibility onto the Congress if anything should happen to the children? It would throw the responsibility on the Congress. Is that not the real purpose back of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I hope the gentleman heard the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER]. He explained that matter very clearly, absolutely, and satisfactorily, and supported the viewpoint of the gentleman from Ohio. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] gave a very clear exposition of the proposition, and I will not go further into it. In the few minutes I have left I should like the attention of the author of the bill in order to bring a matter before him. Regardless of whether we pass the bill or not, none of these children can come to this country unless they comply with the immigration laws.

Mr. HENNINGS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That is the position of the gentleman. There is no question but that there is going to be some misunderstanding about this. For instance, it has been the law of this country for years that the entry of immigrants should be controlled by law. And it was brought out here today that when a certain individual called up and wanted a relative to come in that he was advised that a $1,000 bond would be required. They are not admitted, because the exigencies or the circumstances are such that they cannot assure the authorities that they will return or that they can return. Another person says that the State Department has been permitting these people to come in under a $50 bond. Let us not have a misunderstanding about this. Now, will the gentleman permit an amendment to be offered as follows: After the words "Secretary of State" insert the words "subject to the provisions of the immigration laws"? If he will permit that, I am sure it will satisfy a good many Members.

Mr. HENNINGS. I may say to the gentleman I do not think such an amendment is necessary. It probably is not germane. We have assumed that the immigration laws operate. I have no objection to it, although it is surplusage.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I cannot agree with the gentleman.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, if he does not deem it necessary to offer it, perhaps I shall offer it.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am unable to offer it. I may say that the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Rules considered this bill as written. I think the gentleman's suggestion is unnecessary. We know the immigration laws operate regardless of anything we may do in this bill, and I think the gentleman's amendment is surplusage.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I cannot agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not want to create any confusion about this bill, because it is an amendment to the Neutrality Act, having no relation whatsoever to our immigration laws.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Then can the gentleman answer this question: Why is it that the Secretary of State has taken these refugee children and put them in a separate category? At one time they were going to come in under visas. Now they are coming in as visitors. The law provides an unlimited number of these visitors may come in, but they must all come in alike. Why is it that the Secretary of State compels the giving of a thousand-dollar bond in certain cases while these children can come in by giving only a $50 bond, which is so small that it amounts to no bond whatever?

The gentleman should not stand here and make the principal part of his argument to the effect that this does not obviate and does not set aside any immigration laws and still he is not willing to close the door and say there shall not be any ambiguity about the matter. Let us be fair. Let us permit the children to come in but let us put it up to the Secretary of State to protect the immigration laws. I am willing to trust the Secretary of State, but let us give him to understand that all must come in alike and that they must come in under the terms of the immigration law about which the gentleman has protested so loudly and which he says they must comply with. That ought to be fair. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I expect to offer such an amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS].

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this bill is unnecessary, it is fraught with danger, yet I am going to vote for it. It is unnecessary because clearly sections 2 and 3 of the Neutrality Act do not need any amendment in order to permit this.

Section 2 merely says that it shall be unlawful for an American vessel to carry any passengers or articles or materials to any State named in such proclamation.

Section 3 provides that after the President has designated combat areas it shall be unlawful, except under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed, for any citizen of the United States or any American vessel to proceed in or through such combat areas.

The President therefore has full power to prescribe, by rules and regulations, for the bringing back of refugee children. The reasons, I submit, why we have approval of this bill by the administration are two: First, that the administration does not want the country to know the broad implications and the broad powers conferred upon the President under the combat-areas provision; and, second, the administration wishes the approval of Congress before any such unprecedented and unusual and unexpected step is taken. I welcome the attitude of the administration on this second point in being willing to share its responsibility for the conduct of foreign affairs with the Congress, and that is one reason why I intend to vote for this bill.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Did not the President exercise that authority a number of weeks ago when he sent the American-flag ship Manhattan and another flag ship to Ireland and to Italy through the war zone to bring back American citizens? The gentleman remembers that the Associated Press stated that the President sent an American-flag ship to Italy to bring back American citizens from the war zone and that ship left a thousand or more American citizens in the war zone while they brought back 892 alien refugees.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I think the gentleman is mistaken in those two instances, because Ireland is still neutral, and Italy was neutral and not a belligerent at the time the ship was sent, although the ship, in all probability, had to traverse war zones, or certainly danger zones, in going to and from the places to which it was sent.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, is he not?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Has the Dominion of Canada or Australia or the other large and wealthy portions of the British Empire made arrangements to bring some of the British refugee children to their lands and to take care of them?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I understand they have, although I am willing to be corrected on that.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The gentleman is a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee. Have any overtures been made to Germany or Italy for the safe passage of these ships?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Not directly by our Government that I know of.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman being a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, I want to ask him this question: If the President has had the power heretofore to bring children from the war areas to the United States under suspension of the rules, or whatever law may govern the situation, why was not that benefit given to the French and the Belgians and the citizens of the other so-called Low Countries?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I think the reason, probably, was that the developments were so rapid that there was not time to have such a migration organized.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does this bill apply only to British children?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. This bill is occasioned by the present plight of British children as publicized in this country by the British committee, but it applies——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 more minutes.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. This bill, however, applies with equal force to any other nation. It does not specify any country, although it was the situation of the English children which was the occasion for its being introduced and considered.

Mr. CRAWFORD. So, theoretically, it does apply to all countries, but, practically, only to England at the moment?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. For the moment; yes.

Mr. JONES of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield to my colleague from Ohio.

Mr. JONES of Ohio. Has the President endorsed this bill?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Not that I know of.

Mr. JONES of Ohio. Is it not reasonable to assume, then, that the President, having charge of foreign affairs and possessing information that this Congress does not have, we may assume he would consider it dangerous for our ships to travel in this zone; in other words, having the power and not exercising it, can we not assume he considers it too dangerous for him to make that decision?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. That is a possible assumption, but I believe that the safeguards contained in this bill will be sufficient, although as has already been pointed out, this bill is fraught with great possibilities for international involvement.

Here is the reason I am going to vote for the bill. This is a typical, American, idealistic, sentimental, humanitarian gesture. In a world filled with war and hatred, I am glad to see our nation, even at some risk, take steps that are in the direction of peace and friendship.

Now, what will happen if this bill passes? We will put Germany on the spot just as the bill we passed for $50,000,000 for Red Cross relief, a bill that was originally sponsored by the distinguished ranking minority member of the Foreign Affairs Committee [Mr. FISH]. That bill has put England on the spot. We will now find out whether the starvation and the bombing of women and children are a necessary part of the conflict that is going on over there.

I cannot conceive that either of the belligerents would grant a safe conduct under circumstances that would not be beneficial to it, unless the other belligerent would turn around and grant a similar safe conduct under circumstances which would be beneficial to that belligerent. Therefore we are going to smoke out the fundamental humanitarian intentions of the belligerents by this bill and by the prior one that we passed. That will be a good thing. It will also be a good thing that we announce to the world once more that America is a humanitarian, a kindly and friendly nation toward little children and toward people in distress. We may have advantage taken of our generosity. We will attempt to prevent it, but it seems to me that in such times it is worth while even though this law is not needed to make this possible, even though this law is fraught with certain dangers for us to take this step.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do I understand the gentleman to say something like this, that Germany, for instance, is not likely to give her consent to such transfer of refugee children unless England in turn gives her consent that we may send ships to Germany, in the event starvation becomes imminent there, as a result of the British blockade, so that German refugee children may be brought to the United States?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. That is one possibility. The other is that Germany may refuse safe conduct to these ships which bring away English refugee children unless and until England gives safe conduct to have ships go to Belgium and to France, and we in turn would not send those food ships unless we had additional guaranties from Germany that the food supplies would go to refugees who need them.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And if we do send food ships to Germany under such an agreement we run contrary to our parallel action in helping England enforce the embargo against Germany and the axis, for instance. In other words, we run contrary to our proposed hemisphere agreement, which is now before us asking for half a million dollars.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. We have to do some thinking on this proposition that it is just as brutal to starve little children as it is to bomb them any place in the world, and we have to think through the implications that go with that thought.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, and I am for it because I believe that it is in keeping with our Christian American traditions. I cannot for the life of me become aroused about the implications made here of the dangers with which this bill is fraught in the possibility of one of our ships being mined when bringing some of these children over here. We have appropriated billions of dollars for defense, and we are going to appropriate more money for defense. We have allotted money to be sent over to these belligerent nations for the Red Cross to take care of the suffering over there, and we have shipped airplanes and other implements of warfare to some of the belligerents with which men, women, and children, and all of the people in other countries, will be slain. Certainly it is in keeping with American ideals in giving aid and in assisting people throughout the world who are in danger. In voting for this bill we serve notice on the world that this country is not interested in anything except good will, and in promoting good will among men. I do not believe we want the rest of the world to get the impression that we are a Shylock, and I do not want our people to get that view. This is not going to cost the American Government any money. It is not going to cost us anything.

It merely gives our people, who will take over these individual cases, the opportunity to spend their money in doing good for the people in greatest need. I cannot join with some of my colleagues in their view or in their fear that if something happens to one of these ships it might involve us in war. If the intemperate statements of the President of the United States are not sufficient to involve us in war, if our activity on behalf of some of the belligerents and our opposition to other belligerents will not involve us in war, certainly bringing in these children from all these countries will not. [Applause.]

I understand this bill not only applies to British children but it applies to the children of every one of these nations.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield to the distinguished gentleman.

Mr. BLOOM. It does not refer to any particular children. It says "refugee children of all war-torn countries."

Mr. BENDER. I understand that.

Mr. BLOOM. It does not mention any particular class of children at all.

Mr. BENDER. That is what the bill provides and that is what the sponsors of the bill say.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield to my good friend.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. The gentleman has made the statement that this will cost this country nothing. Is it not a fact that Katharine Lenroot of the Labor Department appeared before the Appropriations Committee this morning and asked for $124,000 to administer this movement?

Mr. BENDER. The gentleman makes the point that Katharine Lenroot of the Labor Department has asked for $124,000. On the basis of our appropriation of $69,000,000 for a dam at T. V. A. and on the basis of our appropriation of billions for defense and our appropriation for ships to send to some of the belligerents, that is almost nothing. What is a mere $124,000 as compared with billions of dollars we appropriated last week? In fact, that bill went through this House like a cat goes through a dog show. [Laughter.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. BENDER. We passed that bill in a few minutes' time without a record vote, with less than 100 Members on the floor. Here we are spending 2 hours, plus 1 hour on the rule, discussing a bill which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] says will cost $124,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to ask this question with reference to cost. It is my understanding that when refugees want to leave England and come to the United States they have to pay something like three or four times the travel cost or tariff on the American ship sent over in this manner, that they have to pay on a British ship coming this way. Is the situation such that England does not have the ships on which to send these people, so that we have to send our ships, or is it necessary for us to send ships in order to have space to accommodate the passengers?

Mr. BENDER. I am not an expert on that. I yield to the distinguished chairman of the committee to answer the question.

Mr. BLOOM. In other words, these ships are going over there entirely for this purpose. It is the safety of the thing that counts. That is all we are concerned with. If the British ships go over, they will have to be convoyed, and it is impossible for them to do that at the present time. These ships go over in ballast and come back only with the children and their guardians.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it intended that they will pay the full tariff?

Mr. BLOOM. We do not know anything about the tariff they will charge, but I assure the gentleman it is not a money-making proposition. These organizations and different sccieties are composed of women of the highest standing in the community. They are very charitable women. They are only trying to do a humanitarian act. I do not think anyone has ever questioned the fact that they will do it as cheaply as they possibly can, but without one cent of cost to this country.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield to my good friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The gentleman was mentioning the possible cost. If we have to take the word of this fellow Hitler guaranteeing safe passage, and if we know him, he may break his promise, and if a ship is sunk, carrying all these children, you can imagine our country going right into war. Then it will be the cost of war.

Mr. BENDER. If we are doing this on the word of Hitler, I would not take Hitler's word on a stack of Bibles any more than I would the word of most of these international statesmen.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. You must have a guaranty from Mussolini and Hitler before you have safe passage.

Mr. BENDER. I understand that.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I think that is a fair question, but in the name of common sense and reason everybody must know that Hitler is not looking to take us on, at least at the present time. He does not want war with the United States, and he is not going to sink one of these ships, because he knows it may involve his country in war.

Mr. BENDER. I thank the gentleman. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON], ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I am for this bill without apology. I have heard several speeches made today where Members criticized the bill and then wound up by saying they were going to vote for it. I am for the bill because I believe that the bill is right. I believe the bill is just. I believe it is in the interest of humanity and I do not believe that it compromises our rights as a neutral, or affects our neutrality. It treats refugee children of all countries alike, and provides our ships shall not go into danger zones unless in advance they are granted safe conduct by all of the belligerents.

I think I know something about the neutrality legislation on the statute books and the previous laws we have written. This bill was not brought in without a hearing by the Foreign Affairs Committee. Exhaustive hearings were held at two different sessions of the committee. At the conclusion of the hearings the committee unanimously reported it out. I think it is one of the few bills in recent years that have come from our committee with an entirely unanimous vote. In order to be sure that the vote was unanimous—there was no demand for a roll call—at my suggestion I asked the chairman to have a raising of the hands of those present. I wanted to know whether it was unanimous or not. There was a full attendance. Not all the members were there, but considerably more than a majority, and both parties were represented. Every member present raised his hand.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I notice this bill provides that such vessel is proceeding under safe conduct granted by all of the states named in the proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a) of the Neutrality Act. Does that include Russia?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. That includes every country that has been named as a belligerent in the neutrality proclamation.

Mr. CURTIS. Has Russia been named?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I cannot say. I am not sure whether Russia has been named as a belligerent, or not. It may have been so named when they attacked Finland. For the moment I do not recall.

We could not in this bill affect any governments except those nations that had been named as belligerents, because we are simply amending the neutrality law as applied to nations that have been denounced as belligerents in the neutrality proclamations, and we have got to conform to that.

Mr. CURTIS. When was the last proclamation issued?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I cannot answer the gentleman as to the date of the last neutrality proclamation. The gentleman can find that out from the State Department.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the gentleman know whether or not Italy is included in that group?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Yes; I distinctly recall that Italy has been designated as a belligerent in one of the President's neutrality proclamations.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I am sure my friend read in the newspapers recently where Great Britain sent word to the world that she would not permit relief to be sent into the countries that are now dominated by Germany. Would not this bill be far-reaching if we amended it to tell Great Britain that we would not take her children into the United States unless she permitted the United States to send foodstuffs to children who are starving in the countries dominated by Germany?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. In reply to the gentleman's question I may say that the bill is not designed to affect the rights of one belligerent against another, it is not designed to determine whether a belligerent is acting rightly or wrongly; it is simply designed to amend the neutrality law so that these mercy ships can go to save the lives of children in war-stricken countries. Now I would like to proceed in explanation of the bill.

Mr. DONDERO. Before the gentleman does that will he not yield for a question?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. This bill has a tremendous human appeal. The thought has occurred to me that if one of the belligerent powers should refuse consent to guarantee the safe passage of these ships, the responsibility for the safety of these children shifts from the United States to that nation which refuses to give its guaranty of safe passage.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. The gentleman is right. If the bill becomes a law, our ships will not go into danger zones unless all warring nations agree to grant safe conduct to such ships which go to evacuate these refugee children. If a nation refuses to grant such safe conduct, the responsibility is theirs, not ours, but in the passage of this bill we will at least have made an effort to save the lives of some of these innocent children who are about to be slaughtered.

Let me for a moment discuss the question raised by my good friend, and a member of the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS], with reference to whether or not the President now has this power and whether or not legislation is required. He is a good lawyer and entitled to his opinion, but I differ with the gentleman.

Earlier in the debate the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON] asked my opinion on this question, to which I replied in my opinion the President did not have the power to modify the danger-zone provisions of the neutrality law so as to permit mercy ships to go in to rescue refugee children. I have since carefully studied the law and am positive he does not have such power.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Cannot the gentleman let me have more time?

Mr. BLOOM. Demands for time are such that I cannot spare more.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas if he needs it.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I thank the gentleman from New Jersey. I shall try to answer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] in 3 minutes, but that does not allow me much time. The gentleman bases his opinion that the President now has such power upon the ground that section 3, subdivision (c) states that the President may from time to time modify or extend any proclamation issued under authority of this section. Is that the section the gentleman contends gives the President this power?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. If the gentleman will yield briefly, I base it on section 3 (a) containing the exception: "Except under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed."

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I call attention, however, to the fact that the section on combat areas is all predicated upon one question and one question only, and that is with reference to protection of citizens of the United States. Combat areas are defined and prescribed for one purpose and one purpose only: That the President shall find that the protection of the citizens of the United States so requires. You hang every authority he has under the act upon that power. That is the keystone of the provision. These refugee children are not citizens of the United States and the power now sought to be imputed to him under the neutrality law is not with reference to the protection of citizens of the United States but citizens of other countries, and it is obvious he could not so expand the law. I call attention further to the well-known rule of interpretation and construction: That when certain exceptions are specified wherein power can be exercised that in itself is an inhibition against further exceptions not named therein. So the act provides "excepting the American Red Cross" in section 4 of the provisions. Since the law itself specifies an exception with reference to the Red Cross under the well-known rule of interpretation that in itself is an inhibition precluding other exceptions, and particularly so with reference to citizens of other countries within the combat zone.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I am sorry, I cannot yield; I have only 2 minutes and perhaps that has expired.

Let me conclude with this thought: There are a great many hobgoblins conjured up in the brains of certain Members. They are afraid we are going to have a flood of foreigners descend upon us. They are afraid it is going to get us into war. This bill does not affect the immigration and naturalization laws. It will not bring in a single person or individual who is not now permitted to come in under the immigration and naturalization laws. It will not be effective unless all governments consent in advance thereto. I have no sympathy with the plea that because all children cannot be saved, none should be saved.

This bill should be passed, I believe, because it is purely a humanitarian measure to save the lives of innocent children, and its passage means that America stands for the preservation and the salvation of human life. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one-half minute to say that I have just received a petition from nearly 100 of the citizens of my district urging that the Congress pass immediately the pending legislation.

Mr. Chairman, it now gives me great pleasure to yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, on page 9873 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, dated August 5, 1940, there appears this language:

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill at the present time.

That had reference to the bill now being considered. I objected to the consideration of the bill when it was on the Consent Calendar last Monday because I felt its provisions should be discussed on the floor of the House before being approved. I make no apology whatsoever for my objection made at that time.

Mr. Chairman, the bill is far reaching. It does tear your emotions to pieces, and, of course, the bill will not be voted down. It seems to me that the wisest thing the British people could possibly do would be to keep these children under the British flag, in Canada or Australia, or in some other possession of the British Empire, surrounded by British institutions, British atmosphere, and British culture. But it is not for us to say what they shall do with their children after the bill is approved. If they come here, we shall, no doubt, do with them the best we can. If they do not come here, then that relieves us of any responsibility. But if they come, we will certainly have the responsibility of a guest in our home. That we cannot avoid. The responsibility will be with us 24 hours a day so long as those children are within the continental United States or its territories.

Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to make this very brief statement in the RECORD to clear my position on the bill.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no man in my sympathy for the children of Europe who are the victims of the war now going on. I doubt if anyone in the House here has a monopoly on the milk of human kindness. We should not permit our emotions to keep us from looking into the provisions of the measure before us. The report on this bill is very incomplete, and the House has very little information before it as to what this measure means. The bill on its face would permit all of the children under 16 years of age in Italy, Germany, Holland, Belgium, France, Norway, and Great Britain to be brought to this country in American ships.

While some of the proponents urge that only a handful would come, yet as a matter of fact it would permit millions to come. There is no limitation whatsoever in the bill as to numbers or as to nationalities. It is said that the bill does not amend our immigration laws. I insist that it does. One of the proponents said we could bring in children from China under this bill. Under our immigration laws Chinese nationals have no right to come to this country as temporary or permanent immigrants. As a matter of fact, in my opinion, the proponents of this bill are thinking alone of the refugee children of Great Britain. We have no information before as to the need of bringing these children into the United States. There is nothing said about their financial condition or whether in the end they would become charges on the people of the United States. If we are about to take a long, big step amending the immigration laws of this country, we ought to know it. If we permit 50,000 or 100,000 to come in under this bill in contravention of our present immigration laws, as the war progresses will we, under its terms, admit tens of thousands or perhaps a million others?

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I will have to have a little more time.

Mr. BLOOM. I will yield the gentleman a minute if he will permit me to make this observation.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLOOM. May I say to the gentleman that this in no way amends, alters, or does anything in the way of taking away from our present immigration laws. You could do the same thing if this were peacetime. You could do the same that we are asking in this resolution if it were not for the fact we want to be secure so far as the safety of these children is concerned. That is all. We are not amending the law.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. If that be true, then the President of the United States and the immigration authorities could act without any action on the part of the Congress.

Mr. BLOOM. Perhaps they could, but the idea of being secure and having the safety of these children secure by getting permission from all of the countries named in the President's proclamation is the whole crux of this resolution.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Of course, we know, and the gentleman and the House know, that there will be no refugees from Germany, nor from Italy. We are going to take sides with Great Britain. No other ship can go to these warring nations and bring children unless Germany, Italy, England, France, and other warring nations agree. I think it is an idle gesture because the chances are that Germany and Italy having no refugees will not agree to this proposition. We are simply making a gesture here that does not mean anything.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The gentleman mentioned a moment ago certain immigration barriers. The several organizations sponsoring this bill we are now considering likewise appeared before the Immigration and Naturalization Committee of the House advocating a change in the immigration laws.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Absolutely. This is just an entering wedge. You bring in 50,000 or 100,000 under this procedure and you will have a stronger appeal later on, perhaps, to let in another 100,000, then still another 100,000, and whatever the good intentions of the people are who take care of them now, who can look forward to a year from now or to 5 years from now so far as the conditions are concerned?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. I believe we all share the great humanitarian spirit demonstrated in this bill, but the proponents seem to indicate that we are proposing to take care of a large percentage of these children. I wonder if the gentleman can estimate the percentage of children of Great Britain that will be cared for under the provisions of this bill and the great humanitarian efforts of our people. Let us not fool ourselves on that point. Would it not be something like only one-fourth or one-half of 1 percent of all of the children exposed to shot and shell in England?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. That is the point. It has never been made clear to me why we should reach out and take care of one-half of 1 percent of the refugee children of Great Britain and neglect the other 99½ percent or ignore Belgium, France, Holland, and all. It is not merely a question of taking care of a few thousand refugee children of Great Britain. That is not the only issue here. There are other questions.

All sorts of propaganda have been and are now being used in this country in order to get us into war on the side of Great Britain. Is it the purpose in bringing these British children here and scattering them over the United States to create another great source of propaganda to involve us in the European war?

Our present neutrality laws that were urged upon the Congress by the President and his administration forbid American ships to enter the waters of these warring nations. This bill amends our neutrality laws to permit American ships to go into these waters to bring refugee children to the United States to be cared for by American families who are willing to take the children, provided each and all these warring nations agree that this be done. In other words, Italy and Germany must agree that these ships may enter the harbors of Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, and so forth, and no nation will molest the ships or the children.

Now it is generally understood that Germany and Italy have no refugee children. Is it reasonable to suppose that Germany and Italy will agree for the United States to take care of the refugee children of Great Britain and thereby shift this burden of food and clothing for the children to the United States?

And no one yet has told us what refugee children are. Are they children of families driven out of Germany, Italy, Poland, and other countries into Great Britain, or are they the children of British subjects? It is urged that these children be brought from Great Britain to escape the dangers of war. I assume that there are at least 10,000,000 children under 16 years of age living in Great Britain. Why bring a handful, as some say, to escape the dangers of war and leave the 10,000,000 other children behind if they are the children of British subjects? It has never yet been answered how many are to come, what is their nationality, or why should some come and 99½ percent remain behind. Is the whole thing propaganda, or will they come in great numbers, and what arrangements will there be to protect these children, this year and for a year or 5 years if the war should continue that long? How and when are they to return to their own country? We have been unable to get answers to these questions.

My own personal opinion is that the purpose of this movement is war propaganda. We notice in the press pictures day by day of certain socially prominent American families taking some children of socially prominent persons in Great Britain. Will the children of the working class and common people of Great Britain have an equal chance to escape the horrors of war.

It is provided in this bill that American ships must be used; and why?

Mr. BLOOM rose.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I know why.

Mr. BLOOM. I thought you were asking me.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Can I not look at the gentleman without causing him to rise from his seat? [Laughter.]

Great Britain is using her ships to carry munitions of war and war supplies. She needs ships and this is a plan to have America furnish the ships to go into the war zones and bring her refugee children here to the United States.

Mr. HINSHAW. Are not those British ships returning empty from British ports to the United States?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The ships are returning empty.

Mr. BLOOM. If I give the gentleman a minute, will not the gentleman let me answer?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Of course, the gentleman as usual has the answer, but it is not always convincing to me and a lot of others. But I am going to let the gentleman give his answer.

Mr. BLOOM. I will just say to the gentleman that England is certainly not bringing any war materials in ships here, and let me say also that if we brought these children over here in her own ships they would have to be convoyed and if they were convoyed they would be doubly subject to attack.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes; and that is what I have in mind with respect to our American ships. Our Navy depends upon its merchant marine and this is just simply a plan to use the American merchant marine to augment the British Navy and the British merchant marine.

You are going to have the American flag painted on the sides of these ships. You are going to British harbors because that is where you are going to get your refugees, if you get any. Now, something is liable to happen to one of those ships. The papers today carry the report that one of these child refugee ships was sunk or lost somewhere. Now, you let one of these American ships over there in the war zone get sunk with a lot of children on the ship, and we know at once that there will be a great flare-up of denunciation, intense hatred and feeling toward Germany which would inflame the American people and push us closer and closer to this war precipice on which we are standing today. Why should the United States take that chance? Some people here want to take care of them, you say. Why, you have millions of children here in America today in worse shape than those you seek to bring here. Why not let your humanitarian spirit run riot a little while and take care of these little, hungry, deserted orphans and the starving and naked children here in America, because in reading that old Book of Books you will find that it points out "He that provideth not for his own household has denied the faith and is worse than an infidel." This could get us into that war.

I am opposed to the intervention of this Nation in the European-Asiatic-African war. If we become involved in that war, with $50,000,000,000 of direct and indirect debts and obligations of this Government today, it will mean the complete bankruptcy of this country, a complete overturn of our economic, social, and political life, a tremendous lowering of our standard of living, and it would mean a great loss of life of the flower of the young manhood of this country, it would mean hundreds of thousands of widows and orphans, and worst of all, in the end we would likely lose our own freedom and liberty.

It is our first duty as the chosen representatives of the American people to protect our own country and the rights and interests of our own children and people. I am unwilling to take any step that will likely lead this country into war.

I wonder what plan would be used to select the handful of British children, leaving millions of other British children as well as millions of children in France, Belgium, Holland, Poland, and Norway behind? The children in those countries have suffered and will suffer because of the ravages of this war, but Great Britain, believing it is to her own interest, has adopted a blockade, the purpose of which is to starve her enemies into submission. It is not for me to criticize this policy of Great Britain, but by reason of this policy, according to reports, an innumerable host of children and adults will perish because of the lack of the necessities of life. Great Britain thinks this policy is necessary to protect her national life and her people and weaken Germany.

It is my understanding that President Roosevelt and his administration do not favor sending food to the needy people in the countries conquered by Germany because it would nullify the blockade policy of Great Britain and help Germany. This policy is not dictated by humanity—it is one of the cruel necessities of war.

The European nations have not been able through the centuries to solve their disputes. We found through bitter and costly experience in the last World War that we could not settle their age-old quarrels for them. My first and deepest concern is to save this country from the horrors of another World War.

Great Britain has many dominions—Canada, Australia, South Africa, and others. What refugees, if any, have these dominions received from the British Empire?

We have already suffered much from this war. I hope that it will not break down our immigration laws, with our ten to twelve million unemployed industrial workers and with 20,000,000 people demanding some form of relief in our own country. No cause could appeal to us more strongly than to aid distressed innocent children who are not responsible for the war. We should insist, however, in knowing something about this whole matter. Will this break down our immigration laws, is it propaganda, and will it likely involve us in the European war?

This is an unusual and extraordinary proceeding for this country. I know of no other neutral country in the world that has taken a similar course.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I shall insist on adopting amendments that will set up safeguards for our country. I am unwilling to throw down the bars of our immigration laws or to take steps that will likely involve our country in war by sending our ships into these war zones. We remember the Maine. It was in Cuban waters in the war between Cuba and Spain. The Maine was blown up. Many persons insist that some daring Cubans blew up the Maine in order to get the United States into that war on the side of Cuba. The seas are full of floating mines and submarines. Within the last 2 months German submarines, by mistake, destroyed a British transport which was carrying hundreds of German prisoners to Canada. Another submarine blew up a ship that was carrying French soldiers who had surrendered back to France. They thought the sea was clear and they had safe conduct. I again pose the question, What if one of these American ships loaded with refugee children should be accidentally torpedoed or blown up by these magnetic mines or some daring persons, anxious to create sentiment against Germany, should intentionally torpedo or blow up the ship? It would be blamed on Germany or Italy, and our people would be swept into a war frenzy, and we might find ourselves involved in that war overnight. In that event our own children and our own country would be scourged by war.

May I again urge in the consideration of this measure, as one of our colleagues said today, to stop, look, and listen, and, above all things, to do some deep thinking.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. IZAC], a very prominent member of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is any danger of our having trouble with the immigration laws as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] seems to visualize. The British quota is 65,000 a year, and they have about 50,000 yet for this year. They could take over all the little children under that quota without having a visitor's visa or permit. However, this does not apply merely to British children. You may remember when Norway was invaded, that several Norwegian families migrated to England. Likewise, thousands of Holland and Belgian and French children went to England. This would permit the evacuation of those children as well as British children if this legislation becomes law. And also of children from all the warring nations.

Many of our people do not like the idea of our taking foreign children when there is distress and suffering in this country, but I really believe that where there are families who want to adopt these children, or at least have them as visitors for 6 months or a year, it certainly is a humanitarian thing to do to permit them to come over here and have these families take them, especially as it applies to British children. They speak the same language as we do, and therefore it is not such a terrible thing to take them away from their families, and give them this little vacation.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IZAC. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Do I understand that this movement is to be done at the expense of the organizations that are fostering this movement?

Mr. IZAC. That is correct. The only thing that we are attempting to do by this legislation is to make it possible for our ships or any neutral ships to go into the combat zones.

Mr. KEEFE. Does the gentleman understand from his knowledge of this bill and the hearings before his committee that no expense is contemplated to the United States Government if this bill becomes law?

Mr. IZAC. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. KEEFE. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that Miss Lenroot, of the Children's Bureau, appeared before the deficiency committee yesterday morning and asked them for an appropriation to provide funds to inspect the homes into which these children are to go, and that she made the statement, substantially, so I am advised, that it is the contention of that department that these people who are showing such an interest now in these children would lose that interest in 3 or 4 months, and that it would be necessary for the Children's Bureau to make constant inspection of those children at public expense in order to see that they are properly taken care of?

Mr. IZAC. I say to my friend that that is exactly what occurs when any immigrants come in here. In many instances the Children's Bureau has to go and inspect where these immigrant children are and eventually some of them land in orphanages. But we are not going to bring any of these children here until they have been passed on by the organizations interested, and I am sure, from the caliber of the people interested in this thing, that you do not have anything to fear on that score. When men like Bishop Buddy, of San Diego, and the greatest churchmen in the country, Protestant, Catholic, Jewish, all feel the same way about it, that at least, as humanitarians, we should offer this asylum for these people at a time when they are under actual bombardment. Just visualize if you will our navy yard down here and the settlements surrounding it on all sides. Suppose it were bombed. Suppose bombs were dropped on that yard as an objective; they would not always fall in that little enclosure. Some would fall on the homes of these poor people in the neighborhood. The same thing is happening today in the thickly populated war zones of Europe. If we can get any of those children over here, I say it is a wonderful thing to do, and I believe we should try to do more than what they are planning on at the present time, but I do not see how it is humanly possible with the limited shipping that we have and the limited time apparently prior to the launching of the Hitler "blitzkrieg."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY].

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, at this time I wish to congratulate the two Members who worked so hard and faithfully on this bill, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. I also congratulate the committee of American men and women who are devoting themselves to the problem of bringing the children from the war zones abroad to homes in this country.

Last year at this time I was walking around the streets of London. Everywhere one looked you could see large posters with the question: "Have you gas masks for the children? Be sure to obtain them at once for all of your children."

On the second Sunday of August I was attending Mass in the Roman Catholic cathedral in London and heard the beloved Cardinal Hinsley address his flock. It was with a heavy heart and a sob in his voice that the cardinal urged the congregation to cooperate with the Government's plan to evacuate the children from the city. As we listened to the appeal of the cardinal, I could not help to notice the tragedy written upon the faces of the parents as they looked down at their little children. Needless to say, there was not a dry eye in that whole cathedral. Throughout England that same scene was being enacted in all of the churches.

The parents were asked to bring their children to the local schoolhouse with a limited supply of food and clothing. The school authorities would then transfer them to a rural area. The parents were told not to go to the railway stations because it was thought the parting at the friendly schoolhouse would be less difficult for the child and parent.

When I left the cathedral on that Sunday morning I was sad. At my side was my own son, who would be leaving shortly to return to our own beloved and peaceful country. In contrast to his situation I visioned those helpless English children being separated from their parents.

In spite of the impending danger, many of the parents had served notice on the authorities that under no circumstances would they permit their children to be evacuated.

A year has rapidly passed since that eventful day in the cathedral in London, and we all know what has transpired abroad in that time. Today many European countries are confronted with the same nightmare, only to a greater degree. England, Germany, France, Belgium, and all of the other countries do not know what will happen from day to day. When I speak of "those countries," I am only thinking of the minor children in "those countries." I am not thinking of the rulers or the military machines. It is the plight of the children that we are attempting to alleviate by this bill. I do not know of any other act of mercy that the people of our country could perform that would serve humanity to a greater degree than the passage of this legislation.

One of the gentlemen who spoke expressed great fear at the number of children that might gain admission to the United States with the passage of this bill. Personally, I would rather see thousands of helpless children brought into this country than to permit one child to die as a result of the war.

We may have to give up some of our luxuries to aid these unfortunate youngsters, but, after all, we have a brotherhood with the children of the world which requires sacrifices. Let us take this opportunity to perform a genuine service to humanity.

Our action here today will reflect the sentiment and spirit of a great people. The humanity that we have always displayed to the world will again be displayed in the passage of this measure.

The Members of Congress who vote for this bill will be making a contribution to world peace and happiness that we cannot appreciate at the moment.

I am anxious to have the RECORD show that we are going to welcome the children of all nations; that it is not for the benefit of any one country. It would be well for the chancelors of Europe to know that what we are now doing is not to favor one particular nation or to punish another, but only to show our affection for all children. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the duties of a member of the Ways and Means Committee are so exacting and so confining in time that I have found it rather necessary to limit my appearance on the floor to matters directly concerning that important committee. But today I cannot help joining in the humanitarian plea that is going up in this House to care for these refugee children.

I was in my district about the time this bill was introduced and I told the press at that time that so far as I was concerned I believed in cutting every bit of red tape possible in order to accomplish the purposes provided for in the bill.

I recall being in London the same day to which the gentleman who just preceded me referred, as attending the Roman Catholic cathedral. I walked through Hyde Park and even then, before war had been declared, preparations were being made to care for the women and children by digging tunnels under that great park. As we traveled across England we saw tunnels and holes being dug, bombproof places being dug in back yards of homes to protect the families of people who lived in the adjoining houses.

What more could we do for the sake of humanity than to care for these children, or such part as can be brought to this country? The gentleman from Kentucky referred to the fact that some wealthy children could be brought here and cared for. That may be true, and I suppose it is true, because with financial connections you can make contacts with your friends either here or abroad, and bring a few here under those conditions. But because there happens to be a few dollars back of a child is no indication that the other child, without that fortunate backing, is not as much entitled to humanitarian consideration as the child of the wealthy. This bill applies to all children—not the type that can come here and be cared for with maids and governesses and so on, as has been referred to, but it applies to the children of all the people. It is in their behalf that we should make that appeal here today.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. In the letter which the British Ambassador, Lord Lothian, wrote to me and to the chairman of the committee it shows that 98 percent of the children from England will be from poor parents.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is the advantage of this legislation, that will appeal to the care of the poor children and not the ones to whom one or two gentlemen referred, as I have said before, children of wealthy parents.

We still have therefore a greater burden to cover under the protection of our American flag these children who can be brought here and cared for in the homes of Americans, whatever the financial status of their families may be.

Let me add just this one thought, that it is very unfortunate any red tape should be put in the way of a great humanitarian movement such as this being carried on all over the country. Let us appreciate the fact that our fellow citizens want to carry out this desire and are willing to step forward and assume the responsibility; but it is up to us as legislators to cut that red tape and see that that purpose can be accomplished by the people. Many groups are ready to assume the responsibility of the care of these children. I have at least two instances in my home town where responsible persons desire to care for the refugee children.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. If we make a mistake in the passage of this bill it will be on the side of mercy.

Mr. TREADWAY. It will be on the right side. To believe that everything we do is done right or must be done right is not human. We are simply human beings. We do not want to make mistakes, but in this instance if we do make a mistake it will be in the cause of humanity, so I am willing to take the chance of making a mistake.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. A moment ago it was stated that there are American children not being properly cared for, that charity should begin at home and for that reason we should spend our resources in taking care of these underprivileged American children. I recognize the force of that observation and sympathize with it, for I am deeply interested in taking care of American children. However, I ask the gentleman if he does not feel that our opening our hearts and homes for taking care of these refugee children may not generate in us a desire, even in the hearts of these same people, to take care of our own needy children?

Mr. TREADWAY. I believe so. Most certainly we want to take care of our own suffering children, but I believe the experience of taking care of these refugee children will furnish the inspiration for us to go on with our own.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. MURRAY. Last year I brought to the attention of the House the fact that we had 2,240 foundling homes in the United States and about 242,000 children in those homes. Does not the gentleman believe we should help them? At that time I made a plea for the Surplus Commodity Credit Corporation to distribute food to them on a nonsectarian basis. They told me the law allowed them to do it. What has the gentleman to say about such a situation?

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is speaking on a different subject entirely from what we are discussing at this time, and personally I do not care to be drawn into that sort of discussion on this bill. Here is a bill that appeals to our humanitarian instincts, the effort to bring these children over here from war-stricken Europe and find homes for them, and that is what these organizations are anxious to do. This legislation is deserving of our wholehearted support. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, clearly it seems to me the President at the present time has the power to bring these children in, but the bill is before us and was reported unanimously from our committee. It is a humanitarian measure. It seems little enough for us to do. I do not think it is a sound argument against allowing these children to come in to cite the fact that we have many in our own country who are not cared for. I only wish all children in this country were adequately cared for. Perhaps this very measure will make the people more conscious of their obligation and more willing to take care of them if we extend this aid to some of the poor little terrified refugee children of Europe.

The bill, I am sure, will go through, and I believe it will go through without a single dissenting voice, if I know the membership of the House.

My hope now is that God may grant them safe passage. I wish also He might give us the wisdom to make them feel not like refugees but to make them know they are welcome little visitors in our homes, and that we may treat them wisely and well. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from Massachusetts yields back 1 minute.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill is before the House of Representatives today because England for the first time in 900 years is going to be invaded. The people who sponsored this legislation realize, and the Congress must realize it too, that we are trying to move the children out of England that they may escape death and destruction at the hands of the invading nations. And that invasion is almost sure to come to pass.

I am reminded today, when we hear so much Christian spirit expressed, of the crusades that occurred a little after the invasion of England, the Children's Crusade, when little children were led in an army attempting to recapture Jerusalem from the Mohammedans. Those children, of course, were starved, slaughtered, and enslaved. As we debate this measure today, I have wondered how many of us consider how much like that Children's Crusade our forces in the United States are. We have voted $10,000,000,000 for defense, but as I hear Member after Member express his opinion on conscription, I think our motto is going to be "Billions for defense but not one man to carry the arms." We are soon to have before us the National Guard bill, placing the National Guard and the Reserves in the Army. When this bill is passed, we will have raised our standing force to 318,000 men; that is after the National Guard and Reserves are put into service. Yet there are Members who say it is not yet time to vote conscription. I am in favor of calling the National Guard and Reserves for training. But if it is necessary—and it is—to call out the National Guard and Reserves, take them away from their jobs and families, certainly it is fair to conscript the necessary, qualified, and economically best able men of the country to bolster our Regular Army to an adequate defense force. They want to see the insignia on the invading boats or airplanes. They want to see whether they are bearing the Nazi, Fascist, or some other foreign emblem on the wings of the attacking vessel before they start preparation to repel such an invasion.

I want to read a quotation from the speech made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] yesterday, as follows:

> I realize that many Members of Congress are politically on the spot in regard to the conscription bill. I see no reason for those in close districts, if they do not want to, to take any side on this controversial question of conscription at the present time.

I hope and pray that no Member of this House in close districts will play politics with our national defense and let the political future of Members delay consideration of the vitally necessary conscription bill. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the thoughts of the Members will be carried out and that not only English children but the children of Poland, Belgium, and other parts of the world, who have had to run away from these dictators, may be given the same opportunity to come over here. In connection with red tape in the immigration laws, the Committee on Immigration of the House has been holding hearings in connection with the State Department and the Department of Justice to try to cut this red tape in order that you and I may do something real for the unfortunate children of those countries.

Many questions have been raised by a number of Members of the House as to who is going to select these children and as to how we are going to pass on this selection. The fact of the matter is that whatever measure my committee may bring out to bring about their relief will have nothing to do with the present neutrality law. The bill we are passing here today does not repeal or have anything to do with the present immigration law. Under the present immigration law each immigrant, whether he comes in here under a permanent visa or a temporary visa must comply with the existing provisions, namely, those having to do with an examination by a health officer and qualifications with reference to mental and physical ability. All of the requirements must be observed before that person, whether it be a child or an adult on a visitor's or a permanent visa is allowed to enter this country.

This bill, in my opinion, only deals with the cutting of red tape in the neutrality law, and I think you are doing a wise thing in cutting it fast. I hope and trust that my committee will work as fast to cut such red tape as we think ought to be cut in order to give equal opportunity to all refugee children, no matter where they are within the confines of this world.

We were informed only this morning that the Nazi Government is bringing to bear a lot of pressure on other countries not yet in the destructive area and that some English, Polish, Belgian, and Finnish children are within those areas, and that they must be taken out at the earliest possible moment. I appeal to the Members of Congress, let us get together and pass this bill at the earliest possible moment, and if there is any red tape dealing with our immigration laws, my committee is now considering legislation to remedy that phase of the problem, too.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I have been interested in the evacuation of these children from England and elsewhere for some time, and on July 22 of this year I offered the bill, H. R. 10214, which was practically at the same time the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] offered his bill. I may say that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] and myself exercised the utmost care in the drafting of the bill. We consulted the Bill Drafting Commission and advised them to draft a bill so that there would be no discrimination so far as creed or nationality is concerned. I say beyond any peradventure of doubt that this bill is not necessarily for the protection only of British children. It covers children all over Europe, and I would be just as anxious to aid German children as I would be to aid Belgium, French, or British children.

A very significant statement has recently been made by a very distinguished columnist, Raymond Clapper, in the Scripps-Howard newspapers recently. He propounds a question that Hitler might sink one of these ships and answers that question:

> First—
> Said Clapper—
> Hitler is no fool. He is not dragging us into this war right now if he can help it. Second, I am authoritatively informed that the British Government has good reason to believe that if the United States made official request of the German Government, and provided the guaranties that Hitler would naturally expect against misuse of the occasion, a pledge of safe conduct would be forthcoming from the German Government.
> Why not try it?

I repeat, Why not try it? Why not try to rescue these children from the charnel houses that Hitler will make presently in Great Britain?

A statement has been made that the President already has the authority to send these ships across the sea on this rescue work. I doubt the President has such authority. I have examined with experts both in and out of the State Department most carefully, various sections of the neutrality law. Section 3, which has been referred to as being the authority for the President to do this thing, to my mind, gives him no such authority. Section 3 simply provides that the President shall, by proclamation, define combat areas, and thereafter it shall be unlawful, except under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, for any citizen of the United States or any vessel to proceed into or through any such combat area.

In the first place, it is rather a dreadful burden to place on any one man as to sending those ships abroad. It is cruel to place it on a man even as enlightened and as brilliant as is the President of the United States. He has not acted. If he clearly had the power I am sure, judging from his humanitarianism, that he would have acted. The mere fact he has not acted is tantamount to the fact that he has no such authority. Scan the debates on the neutrality law, go over the issues carefully, and you will not find the word child even mentioned. It was never within the realm of contemplation at the time of the passage of this act that we would have the right or that anyone would have the right to send these ships abroad.

Furthermore, we specifically made an exception when we devised section 4 with reference to Red Cross ships. We said with reference to Red Cross ships that they would have to get safe conduct before they could proceed; yet they could proceed regardless of the prohibition contained in other provisions of the act.

If the power to send ships across rested in the President's discretion—Red Cross or otherwise—why did we put in the exception as embodied in section 4. Section 4 would be needless if the contention now made concerning the President's power were sound.

Recently we amended section 4 and thus reaffirmed that the President had no such authority.

Let me read to you portions of a letter sent by the Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, to the Congress, under date of June 17, 1940, wherein he has asked an amendment to section 4 concerning Red Cross ships:

> The Red Cross has dispatched to Europe the ship McKeesport, which it chartered for the purpose of carrying Red Cross supplies to France. The supplies were to be landed in Bordeaux. Under the neutrality law it was necessary to obtain safe conduct from the belligerent governments. This safe conduct was not forthcoming from all the necessary governments, and consequently the vessel was dispatched to Bilbao, Spain, with the expectation that its cargo might be landed there and transported into France. There seem to be practical difficulties as far as that procedure is concerned, and the question now arises as to whether the vessel ought not be diverted from its course to one of the belligerent ports where the need is paramount.
> This raises the question of the general applicability of the neutrality law to Red Cross shipments and has put the matter in the forefront of the Department's thought. After consultation with Mr. Norman Davis of the Red Cross, we have come to the conclusion that it would be infinitely better if the Neutrality Act were amended to permit Red Cross ships on voyages of mercy to proceed simply after notification to belligerents that the specific vessel will go to a named port, it now being demonstrated that it is impracticable to operate under the present provisions of the law.

In other words, the Secretary of State called for an amendment to section 4 so as to send the Red Cross ship McKeesport from Bilbao, Spain, to France. The boat was originally to go to Bordeaux, but Bordeaux was about to be bombarded and the course of the ship was changed so that it might proceed to Marseilles. However, the ship could not go to Marseilles because of section 4. Therefore, we had to further amend section 4, which we did by passing House Joint Resolution 573, wherein we struck out of section 4 the words "proceeding under safe conduct granted by states named in any proclamations issued under the authority of section 1 (a)." In other words, the Red Cross ship, the S. S. McKeesport, then proceeded to Marseilles without safe conduct.

We passed the bill because Secretary of State Cordell Hull had stated in the aforesaid letter of June 17 the following:

> If you feel that you can support this measure, I should be very glad if you would introduce it and expedite its passage to whatever extent possible, because it seems desirable in view of the unsettled situation in Europe to divert the McKeesport, which is now at sea, from its present run, to Bordeaux or some other belligerent port as conditions render advisable or expedient and where there is very great need for the cargo.

Thus, by amending section 4, we again affirmed the conclusion that the President could not act without some authority from Congress. If the President had the power to send any ship, mercy ship, or Red Cross ship, why would we have put into the Neutrality Act section 4, in the first place, and in the second place, why would we have amended section 4 with regard to the Red Cross ships? This matter should be taken from the realm of doubt. The President should not be asked to act where there is such doubt, especially with the lives of thousands of helpless children at stake. We should cut the Gordian knot of doubt by definite action. There is no time to lose. Get these children out of this blazing hell, which is what Hitler will soon make of Great Britain.

I am very happy at this juncture to insert some correspondence which I have received concerning this bill:

MERCY SHIPS FOR CHILDREN,
New York City, July 31.

Congressman EMANUEL CELLER,
New York.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN CELLER: I was disappointed not to find you in when I called at your office before leaving Washington. Your secretary informed me that you had not returned from New York.

As I wrote you, I am very happy to enclose to you herewith a statement, which, telling a little of our women's organization and our sympathy with the cause of child rescue, may be incorporated, we believe, into your remarks. However, if you choose to quote my ideas in your own words or to quote only excerpts, be assured I shall wholly understand, and am only pleased you asked for our statement of feeling in this matter.

You may be sure we shall all be listening with full sympathy at the time you speak tomorrow, and we add our earnest wishes for your great success in putting this plan before the public.

Kindly inform us here if you think of anything at all which your committee could do to further this great cause.

Yours very sincerely,

SUSAN N. PULSIFER,
Co-Chairman.

STATEMENT OF "MERCY SHIP FOR CHILDREN" COMMITTEE

JULY 31, 1940.

One of the interesting and significant aspects about this campaign to free our ships for European children is the fact that the group in America most vigorously and fearlessly campaigning for the change in the Neutrality Act is a committee of women in New York; but do not mistake us; this is no local New York committee, but one with representatives from many other States on its executive committee of fifty or so, and backing up the executive measures and the crusading spirit of these fifty or so women at their national headquarters in New York are many clubs and organizations all over the country and thousands of individual women.

It is interesting and yet really not at all strange that the most aggressive group pushing for this measure should be made up of very average women and mothers; for these ladies have, naturally, been the first to see and feel and express the feeling of the women of America that something must be done about the imperiled or persecuted children of Europe. When you come to think of it, it is just this—the unprotectability of women and children in present-day warfare never really envisaged even a year ago, when the Neutrality Law was passed, that now 10 months after, leads to the considered change in the bill. Modern warfare has turned the defenseless children in every country where war maintains into the status of fleeing refugees, though they remained in their own dooryards and gardens, the English children may soon be fleeing from gun fire over their heads. And where are they to flee to? Canada, far more sparsely settled than our United States, has already undertaken to harbor 10,000 of these children; it is impossible for her to absorb them all. There are 200,000 children now ready to embark . . . but the English boats cannot wait upon their desires. England has her hands full fighting to maintain her very life. She has appealed to us on the children's behalf. Shall her plea go unanswered?

There are many different plans and hopes and procedures for this child-rescue work now being discussed. It is natural, and even right, that the thought that our boats may be soon set free for this mercy work, should arouse the hopes and dreams of help for the children in charitable American hearts. But here the women reply, most practically, too, it seems to me: "Leave these questions till later; bend every effort now to removing the disability in our shipping in the interest of this mercy work. When this is done, and we have the ships, let us help persecuted European childhood wherever it is possible, practicable, and comparatively safe to do so. But now, with the present outlook it is the children of all nationalities living in England who wish to come, are ready to come, whose parents wish them to come—and whom it is practicable for us to fetch, given the ships. Later, when the outlook changes, let us hope we can relieve conditions for still other unhappy children."

We are proud of our American ships, especially the beautiful new America. And what is a more suitable and prouder mission for our American boats than to carry out a mercy errand of our great American democracy; designated in the terms of our Declaration of Independence and our American Constitution as "asylum."

COMMITTEE TO DEFEND AMERICA BY AIDING THE ALLIES,
New York, July 30, 1940.

Hon. EMANUEL CELLER,
1450 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: At the request of Mr. Duncan of this office, I take pleasure in enclosing a brief statement that you may wish to consider for inclusion in your WEAF radio speech Friday evening, August 2.

We are most grateful for your cooperation and wish you every success in speeding the passage of the child-refugee measure.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM C. BANTA, Jr.,
Publicity Department.

STATEMENT FOR USE OF HON. EMANUEL CELLER

Aside from the humane aspects of this measure to permit American vessels to rescue child refugees, it has important military significance as well. We recall how the presence of thousands of refugees in the camps of the Belgian Army affected its defensive tactics and was a factor that led up to the surrender of this little country. It would be most deplorable if the defense of Britain should fail because of refugees becoming a hindrance to British troop movements and otherwise being an unfortunate impediment to tactical maneuvers of the defending forces. For this reason alone, the United States can and should let nothing stand in the way of removing child refugees from the war zone.

To this end, American public opinion has already been outspoken. Since the middle of May it has been voiced through the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, of which William Allen White is national chairman, in seeking the moral and material aid that may legally be given to maintain England as our first line of defense. The committee, organized through nearly 600 community units from Maine to California, has already made known its stand through petitions to the President and to their elected representatives, in which upward of 3,000,000 Americans have joined in signing. Many thousands of others have personally telegraphed or written to Washington their sentiments in behalf of the measure.

This is the way of a democracy, in which the people tell the Government what to do. In a dictatorship, the government tells the people what to do. I urge you, therefore, to exercise your rights as a citizen in a democracy. If you have not already done so, act now to inform your President and elected representatives, by letter or telegram, that you desire the passage of the child-refugee measure.

FOSTER PARENTS' PLAN FOR WAR CHILDREN, INC.,
New York, N. Y., July 30, 1940.

Mr. EMANUEL CELLER,
1450 Broadway, New York City, N. Y.

DEAR MR. CELLER: Grateful thanks for your letter of July 27. We enclose herewith a brochure which will tell you in detail about the work we are doing in England.

It is our earnest prayer that just as many children be brought to safe shores as possible and without loss of time. For the past 4 years we have been caring for children in countries at war. First in Spain, then in France, and now in England.

We have come to know sadly enough the horrible effect of war upon children. Far more horrible than the physical danger is the mental effect, not only of air raids but "the waiting for air raids," after the first has been experienced.

Our files are made up of photos and histories of thousands of children who have been through war. They are no longer children but strained, worried little old men and women. Far too often appears the notation "this child has been so badly shocked it may take years for a recovery." It is because of this experience we plead for England's children to be saved.

The colonies established by the Foster Parents' Plan for War Children will act as a collecting center for those children, we hope, will embark for safe shores. The main function of the colonies, however, is to house, feed, and extend loving care to those children of all nationalities in England who will not find a safe haven. They, too, must be helped. Colonies are situated in what are considered to be "safe areas" in England.

With earnest hope that your broadcast will bring some quick, merciful action,

Sincerely yours,

EDNA BLUE,
Chairman.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS of California. The American people are like all other people in the world, a strange people. We have the idea that the farther away we go with our kind acts the more significance there is to them. We have had the idea for years that it was going to destroy the character of our own citizens if we provided public-works jobs for them, but that it was not going to have any such effect on people far away in other countries if we provided them direct relief. I do not know why this is. I do not understand it. We have even given away buying power to foreign countries over and over in our history, literally given it away, and it has stimulated our economic order when we did it, but at home we do not seem to understand the tremendous importance of enabling our own people to consume their own production.

Some people have said that we ought to take care of our own children first. They are right; we ought to. But I have spent most of my life doing exactly that, and I know that the thing that causes people to take care of needy children is something in their hearts that prompts them to do that. And the question we must ask ourselves is whether or not the failure of this bill would cause one single, solitary American child that is not now cared for to be cared for. I am sure that will not be the result. On the contrary, the impulses in people's hearts that cause them to do good to people are not limited by any boundaries, and if some people are willing to assume a burden and do a good thing in this connection, both they and others may learn for this experience and example to give the care our own children need. So by passing this measure I believe you might be making it more, not less, likely for needy American children to be taken care of.

These kids did not have anything to do with this war. It was not of their making. Yet I believe they are the ones who suffer most. Those few who are brought here will come only because some persons in this country have guaranteed to care for them. Every one of them will therefore create an additional demand for the things we produce here.

And now I want to make another point that I am sure is very important and tremendously misunderstood. There are a lot of people who have the idea that it would solve the unemployment problem if we had fewer people around. That is silly. I come from the city of San Dimas, Calif., a fine little community which has a population of about 3,000. I am sure it is not going to improve business in San Dimas if we have less people there, and every one of the Members of the House knows that the same thing is true in his own community. The solution of the unemployment problem is not fewer people but more buying power in the hands of American consumers, so they will be able to buy the products that the American farms and industries can so easily produce. That is the only road to the solution of the unemployment problem.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from California 1 additional minute.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. That is the only basis for the solution of the unemployment problem and it is a thing I have been pleading for in this House as long as I have been here. This measure has no effect on that problem.

The other great question here is what might happen to one of these ships and what might happen to us if harm befell one of them. On this point, of course, the main thing is that none of these ships can go unless all belligerents first grant safe conduct. I do not believe any government would be foolish enough to touch one of these ships. I do believe that we ought to make up our minds here and now that, so far as we are concerned, we are going to keep our heads under all circumstances.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, before we proceed to casting a unanimous vote for this bill, I yield the balance of my time to the distinguished minority leader on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order during the time allotted to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON] made a statement in which he inferred that those of us who are supporting this bill do so because we realize that England is about to be bombed, and we want to do the humane and humanitarian thing and get some of the English children out of that country before the English cities are bombed. He also intimates that we should realize our danger from Germany and vote for the conscription bill.

Let me say a few words as this is the last time that I shall be here to speak for several weeks, due to attending Army maneuvers, and try to make my views clear. I honestly believe that the whole conscription plan, and I am not impugning the motives of anybody back of it, and I say this with all the sincerity I am able to muster, in absolute good faith, is dishonest and fraudulent, and I propose to prove it. It is based on a dishonest, false, and fraudulent premise, and that is that the volunteer system has failed. Every single quota asked for by the Army General Staff to fill up the Regular Army has been met on time.

This conscription idea and proposal has been built up by the eastern press and a handful of sincere and influential business and professional men in New York City. It has not only deceived the American people, but it has also deceived Members of Congress. They have been led to believe that the volunteer system has broken down and failed and that the Army cannot get sufficient volunteers to fill the quotas as prescribed by the Congress. This is not the truth. Therefore I say to you that this conscription bill that is being forced on Congress, is an attempt to push and railroad it through and is dishonest and unnecessary because it is based upon a fraudulent premise.

Mr. FERGUSON rose.

Mr. FISH. I cannot yield. I do not in any way impugn the motives of any Member of this House who favors the conscription system, or the motives of those on the outside who have forced this on the Congress and the public, but I do denounce those in Congress and outside of Congress who attempt to draw a picture and impugn the motives of Members of Congress and other Americans who still believe in the volunteer system, because it is the traditional American way. I do impugn the motives of anyone who resorts to personal abuse and attacks on those who are opposing the conscription bill as "fifth columnists." I ask whether the commander of the American Legion, Raymond Kelly, who is for the volunteer system as against conscription except in the last resort, is a "fifth columnist." I ask whether the Catholic Church that is opposed to conscription is a "fifth columnist," and whether the Methodist and Baptist Churches are "fifth columnists," whether the Gold and Silver Star Mothers, and the National Legion of American Mothers are "fifth columnists," and whether the American Federation of Labor and railroad brotherhoods are "fifth columnists." I will not vote for conscription until the volunteer system has failed because I honestly believe that conscription imports from Europe their ancient war system, that it will create a psychology of war here, and develop a militarism and autocracy in America, and that it is the road to dictatorship and war. I hope this issue will be fought out to the very bitter end to give the volunteer system a chance, because I am convinced that conscription in the United States is the road to dictatorship, autocracy, militarism, and war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT].

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, when the gentle Nazarene walked the earth, He said:

> Suffer the little children to come unto Me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.

It is a grand thing this afternoon to see the Congress of the United States in its present frame of mind, extending to the stricken children of all nations of the war-torn world the hospitality of these United States. I can imagine the world recognizing the smile of approval playing upon the face of Uncle Sam. I can imagine the warmth in the heart of Columbia, the general mother of this Nation. I can imagine the plaque on the wall of the American home—"Charity forgives a multitude of sins." Today perhaps we are paving the way for a greater appreciation for our own children in this country, where at times silent sanction has been given to the birth-control advocates who would slay the Nation from within. The story told by our school system demonstrates the truth of this statement. We have vacancies in the lower grades today that we never had before. Perhaps realizing the plight of these youngsters, a greater appreciation will come from our children for their own parents, coupled with an appreciation of their own country, in this great spirit of charity manifested today in this body of Congress. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I take great pleasure in yielding 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I have unfortunately been away the past few weeks recuperating from an illness, and although I realize that my vote will not be necessary to have this very well thought out piece of legislation passed by the House, nevertheless, because I am heartily in favor of the provisions of the bill, I made some effort to be here today to support it. Regardless of whether or not the President has the power to bring these helpless children to our shores, I believe the Congress should go on record as approving a bill that may mean life or death to thousands of helpless children who have had nothing to do with the horrible conditions prevailing in Europe today. I believe that this country, in its charity, can well provide for the children that will be brought here should it become necessary to do so. I am sure that God will help those who are willing to accept the responsibility of securing homes for His unfortunate little ones and that He will guide them safely to our beloved America.

So, my colleagues, it is with my heartfelt sympathy for the children of Europe that I want to go on record today as approving this great humanitarian piece of legislation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time to myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I think that about everything that could be said on this legislation has already been said. I would like to clear up just a couple of points. One is with reference to what the President said in his press interview on July 27. The President said:

> The use of American ships to evacuate children from Great Britain, France, and Belgium depends largely upon the validity of assurance of safe conduct for those vessels.

The President wanted to be sure of safe conduct for the children.

There is one point I would like to bring out with regard to refugees in England. You all know when the refugees started to move from one of the different countries to the other they had the opportunity to go into another country. From Poland, from Holland, from Belgium, from Denmark, or any of the countries, they could get out. But you must remember that the refugees who are now in England, who have come there from all of the other countries, if they are forced to flee, have no place to go. Where are they going to go? There is no place for them to go at all, because they are on the island and they are just trapped. They are trapped the same as millions of citizens of France today are trapped on the borderline between the occupied and the unoccupied area.

I would like to say as emphatically as I can that this in no way amends or affects the present immigration law. The immigration law is not changed in this bill and it is not affected in any way.

As far as refugees from other countries are concerned, consent must be received from all of the belligerent countries named in the President's proclamation, whoever they may be or however many there are. All of the consents must be given before any of our ships will be permitted to go over there in ballast to bring those refugee children to this country. That is the only safe way they can be taken out of England. There is no other way that can be devised to take them out.

As far as the State Department is concerned, I would like to say that your Committee on Foreign Affairs received this bill on Tuesday. We called a meeting on Wednesday. We had hearings on Thursday and an executive session on Friday and reported the bill out. So, under those circumstances, it was impossible to receive proper communications from the State Department. But your chairman did call up the State Department to find if there was any objection to this bill. The State Department said they had no objection at all to this bill in its present form.

Mr. EDELSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. EDELSTEIN. It is my intention to vote for and support this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4, as amended, of the Neutrality Act of 1939 is amended by inserting "(a)" after "Sec. 4." and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The provisions of section 2 (a) and 3 shall not prohibit the transportation by vessels, in ballast, unarmed, and not under convoy, of refugee children, under 16 years of age, fleeing from war zones, together with such necessary adult personnel in charge as may be approved by the Secretary of State, if such vessel is proceeding under safe conduct granted by all of the states named in the proclamations issued under the authority of section 1."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, at the end of the bill, change the period to a comma and insert "(a), and if such vessel has painted prominently, distinctly, and unmistakably on each side thereof an American flag and a statement that such vessel is a refugee-child rescue ship of the United States or under United States registry, so that night or day there can be no mistake as to the identity of such vessels."

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, on page 1, line 9, to strike out the word "fleeing." I would like to ask the chairman of the committee and the author of the bill to consider that amendment, my idea being that it is superfluous and a very unhappy term and might well be stricken out, if they have no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Has the committee amendment been adopted yet?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The committee amendment is still pending and is open to amendment.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I have an amendment to offer to the body of the bill. I think the committee amendment should be acted upon first.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true. It can be offered after the committee amendment has been disposed of. Are there amendments to the committee amendments?

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLER to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 3, after the word "painted", insert the words "on a large scale", and in line 4, after the word "thereof", insert "and upon the superstructure thereof plainly visible from the air."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the House to the necessity for this only because of a personal experience I had. On the day war was announced I left Sweden for home on a Swedish steamer. Even that early in the conflict the Swedish Government had ordered painted, not only on the sides of that ship but on the top as well in plain view from the air, very large Swedish flags. They were lighted at night so that submarines approaching from either side of the ship or airplanes from overhead could see very plainly what was what.

The bill as it stands does not provide for the airplane flying over the ship. An airplane flying toward the ship would have no way of knowing what was painted on the sides. The flag should be painted on the superstructure as well.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. There is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. KELLER. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JENKINS of Ohio: On page 1, line 11, after the words "Secretary of State", insert "subject to the provisions of the immigration laws."

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment I spoke about when I discussed this matter a short time ago.

I think we all agree we have had some very beautiful speeches here this afternoon on the subject of humanity and sympathy, and with all of these I agree most thoroughly. This is a very practical amendment. Every man who has spoken—and many of them were experts from the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Immigration—has been very careful to stress to you this one fact, that this bill would not in any way change the immigration laws.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. The committee has no objection to the amendment.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I am glad that the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee has agreed to my amendment. With this assurance I am sure that the amendment will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Ohio: On page 2, add the following as a new section:

"SEC. 2. That before refugee children shall be admitted to the United States under the provisions of this act any citizen of the United States offering to give a child or children domicile and subsistence shall give bond in such amount as may be prescribed by the Secretary of State that such child or children will not become a public charge, and such bond shall also cover the cost of returning such child or children to the country of emigration if and when such return becomes necessary."

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves a point of order against the amendment.

The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated here on the floor that there would be no cost to the American taxpayer in this program. There is nothing in the bill to prevent such cost. If there are people in this country who wish to take these children into their homes and care for them, I do not see what objection there could possibly be to providing in this law that they shall be made financially responsible for the care of these children. That is all this amendment provides.

The gentleman from New York has made a point of order against the amendment. I am not sufficiently familiar with the rules of parliamentary procedure to argue the point.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. At the present time, if you want to bring some relative or friend here from Europe under the quota system, you must give satisfactory evidence to the Department of State that the relative will not become a public charge. In some instances it is necessary to have the bank with which the applicant does business certify that the citizen is financially responsible to meet future obligations.

As I understand this amendment it does no more than to guarantee to the United States that these people will not become public charges dependent upon the Federal Treasury. That is the sum and substance of the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. That is right.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KLEBERG. I would like to make the comment that if, as stated, this bill does no violence to the present immigration laws, then the provision referred to by my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] makes the gentleman's amendment unnecessary.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. The amendment may be unnecessary. I am not saying it is absolutely necessary, but it will do no harm. It will provide by statute exactly that which the proponents of the bill are claiming will be done; that is, that there will be no cost to the taxpayers of the United States. Therefore I am asking that you support the amendment. I think it is fair. I do not think there is anything unfair about it and I cannot see how anyone can possibly object to it since the argument has been made that the people who take these children intend to bear all the cost.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment ought to be voted down. We cannot in this legislation provide regulations with reference to the admission of these children. If you start in with one regulation, you will insert another regulation. This is a matter controlled by the immigration laws, and under the immigration laws all these matters are safeguarded. The amendment which the committee accepted provides that they shall be admitted under the immigration laws, which is a sufficient guaranty that the laws will be followed in the admission of these children and that they will not become public charges.

It would be unwise to undertake to provide by legislation the rules and regulations under which they will be admitted when we have expressly said by the Jenkins amendment that the immigration laws shall apply. We may come into conflict with the immigration laws by adopting some such provision, when the immigration laws already control.

Mr. SCHULTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SCHULTE. May I say to the gentleman as a member of the Committee on Immigration that there will be a bill presented to this House very shortly dealing with this particular subject. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] is absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Entirely so. It is a matter of legislation relating to immigration with which this bill does not deal. This bill with the amendment that has been accepted already provides that children shall be admitted under the immigration laws. We should not therefore undertake to amend the immigration laws here.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EATON. Under the present ruling of the immigration authorities, these children will go to these homes exactly as any other visitor from abroad is taken in and those who take the children will have to provide evidence, sometimes to the extent of being compelled to turn over their income tax returns to the authorities to demonstrate their ability.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Absolutely. Our immigration laws are very strict in that regard and everything is safeguarded. We should not undertake to legislate here with reference to the immigration question.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin: On page 1, line 10, after the word "necessary", insert "American citizen."

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to be heard now?

Mr. BLOOM. No.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is in order under the rules of the House. Perhaps the point of order objection is because my amendment lets the cat out of the bag, and that the major purpose of this bill is to bring in adult refugees. This amendment is a perfecting one to insure evacuation to the United States of child refugees and not adult refugees. Without my amendment one or more adults could be brought here for every child. The child's care would be guaranteed, but the adult's would not. We now have more than 10,000,000 unemployed people in the United States, including nurses, teachers, and tutors. I and many others are sick and tired of reading in the headlines of the press where this duke's child and that earl's child and this duchess' child is coming over here as a war refugee with a tutor and 2 or 3 nursemaids in the name of evacuating refugee children and providing homes for them during the war emergency.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Does the gentleman think his amendment is necessary in view of the acceptance of the Jenkins amendment? After we put in the bill that these children shall come in under the immigration laws, which means that there will be no further increase in the number to come in, would not the gentleman's amendment be superfluous? Cannot the gentleman visualize also that some little child coming over here would have to have a nurse to come with it? Is it not a fact that the gentleman's amendment is unjustified?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Under the language of the bill, without my amendment, there could be brought in one or more custodians or attendants for each child which is brought to the United States under this bill. This bill is sponsored in the name of a child war-refugee bill and should not be used as a vehicle for the purpose of sending American-flag ships into the war zone to transport alien emigrants and visitors to the United States.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. No.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Many of the children who have been coming in here as war refugees, according to the press, are children of the dukes, the duchesses, and the wealthy who have arrived with one or more adult attendants. If the proponents of the bill really mean what they say they mean that they sponsor this bill as a child war refugee bill, then they will support my amendment and make it possible to bring over children under 16 years of age and not adults like Baron Rothschild, and his wife, who came over here by clipper plane with a million dollars' worth of jewels in a bag. I have a battle-scarred American war veteran in my district who cannot bring his wife over here from Italy to take care of his five children because he could not make a showing that she would not become a public charge. Uncle Sam requires him to prove that he has an annual income of more than $2,000, and also requires him to post a $1,000 bond.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. EATON. Would the gentleman inform the House as to the basis of his attitude indicating that he is allergic to nursemaids? [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I do not intend to have a facetious inquiry by my distinguished Republican colleague throw any of the Members off of the right track. We have plenty of unemployed nursemaids in the United States without bringing in alien nursemaids in the name of providing a temporary haven for war refugee children. The gentleman is in favor of bringing in children under 16 years of age, and I hope he will support my amendment and let us bring in children to be taken into the homes of American citizens who will care for them and guarantee that they will not become a public charge. Let us not bring in two or three nursemaids and tutors and valets for the child of the wealthy, the child of the dukes and the earls and the wealthy like the Rothschilds, who came over here with a million dollars' worth of jewels in a bag.

With my amendment incorporated I shall be glad to support and vote for the bill. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin) there were—ayes 73, noes 51.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. BLOOM and Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 91, noes 64.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 2, after previous amendments, insert "Provided, That if any such child shall be brought into the United States and any person who sponsors such child and agrees to see that such child shall not become a public charge, shall be liable for the care and support of such child in the same manner as for the care and support of his or her own child in the State of his or her residence, and that the statutes providing for such care and support shall be enforced against such sponsor."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been heralded as a great humanitarian measure. No one more than I would like to do something for the youngsters over across the water who are in distress, but my understanding of the situation—and I think I speak with absolute assurance and absolute authority—is that the officials of the United States Government do not feel that these youngsters can be brought in here and turned over to private people to look after unless the United States authorities provide a method of fixing standards for their care and inspectors to see that the people who take them take proper care of them and live up to those standards, and on top of that they want a lot of money to do that.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is making a very serious statement. Will the gentleman repeat the statement? It seems impossible.

Mr. TABER. I understand that the authorities of our own Government feel with reference to the children that it is proposed to bring in that we must have a lot of money to set up standards under which these children would have to be cared for and inspectors to enforce those standards, and that they do not feel that the families that would agree to take them could be trusted to do so and go along through with it because they feel that after their enthusiasm had worn off, in a few months they would begin to neglect them. I do not want to see, incidentally, the people of this country taking over a burden of this kind without realizing what they are doing and knowing just how they are doing it.

I have offered this amendment so that anyone who takes a child under these circumstances will be responsible for that child in the same manner that a parent would be responsible. This country cannot afford to bring these children in here unless we provide safeguards for them. We cannot do this by some bureau having an investigation and establishing standards. We must make them live up to the standards already provided.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HENNINGS. I would like to know upon what responsible authority the gentleman makes that statement.

Mr. TABER. I cannot tell the name of the party, but it came directly and straight from a department before a regular committee of this House.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAY. I wonder if the gentleman's amendment would not be really beneficial to the children who are coming over here, inasmuch as they are coming into a strange country and should not be subjected to the hazard of being placed into the hands of some irresponsible person. An amendment which would require the person who gets custody of them to take care of them ought to be adopted as a part of this legislation.

Mr. TABER. Yes; and they should not be left to the vagaries of United States bureaucrats.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it creates a continuing obligation on the part of anyone who takes a child to take care of that child as long as the child is in the United States. The gentleman's amendment will not only be a protection to the child but also a protection to the public in not having at some future time to care for the child when the glamor is worn off.

Mr. TABER. That is right; and unless we do that we would have to provide institutions to put them in.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am in favor of the gentleman's amendment and will vote for it.

Mr. TABER. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, at the outset, when the first amendments were offered to this bill, I stated that any amendment that could be or would be offered which would strengthen the bill would be accepted by the committee. The bill itself is very clear. We have stayed here for hours trying to pass a bill to help the refugee children of the war stricken countries. What you have done now is to destroy the bill. It is impossible for this bill to become properly operative according to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] and just adopted in the Committee. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is at the present time already in the existing law. Either you want to pass a bill to permit American vessels to assist in the evacuation from war zones of refugee children or you do not. I have heard 99 percent of the speakers on the floor today say that they are in favor of it. All are in favor of it. Why should we at the last moment destroy it by offering certain amendments that would naturally destroy its effectiveness? You cannot bring anyone into this country unless you give proper guaranties that they will not become public charges. This is protected in any event. In the first place the British Government has something to say as to what children they will allow to be brought over here.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Is it not true also that what was said in opposition to the previous amendment, that you should not by this amendment undertake to amend our immigration laws, is applicable to this? That is a matter that should be taken up when the immigration law is considered. Is not this an attempt to amend the immigration laws in an indirect manner which should be done directly.

Mr. BLOOM. Yes; and Mr. Chairman, your committee wants to be fair in this matter. If you want to destroy it, vote in this amendment, and let the people understand how this Congress feels with reference to this matter. I want to do the right thing, and I do not want to pass a fake bill. I do not want to pass a bill that means nothing. I have heard something about gestures. It is about time that we stop making gestures and do something real, and not laugh while we are doing it.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman refused to yield to me and I am sorry I cannot yield. I was very much surprised when the gentleman refused to yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BLOOM. I am sorry I cannot. This amendment should not prevail at this time. Let us be fair with these children and not take an advantage of this kind to do something that will destroy the purpose of this bill. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Without undertaking to reflect upon the good spirit and intent of any of the Members I say that in adopting the last amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], and in seriously considering the adoption of this amendment, as the chairman of our committee has said and well said, we are undertaking by that act to say that you do not want this bill. We who have studied this in committee have made an honest effort, in clear, simple language to embrace everything that is necessary, providing at the same time every proper safeguard. We have asked that you repose some confidence in the Secretary of State, in relying upon his good faith, and the use of his sound discretion in the proper administration of this amendment to the Neutrality Act, whether or not it relates to the immigration law.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. Not at this time. I have not the time. I am sympathetic with the desire of Members of the House to safeguard this measure in every possible way, but I do say, please let us not be swept off our feet in our desire to enact amendments which we think may be safeguards, but which are in effect emasculation and possible destruction of the intent of the bill. I do not believe the House wants to do that, but I appeal to you to consider the amendments carefully before you undertake to support them. I yield now to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. The chairman of the committee and the gentleman have indicated that there is something in this bill which authorizes the Secretary of State to make restrictions and rules and regulations.

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. I have read this bill very carefully and I wish the gentleman would point out to me just where you find authority for that statement.

Mr. HENNINGS. I will point it out very clearly. It is in line 10, "together with such necessary adult personnel in charge, as may be approved by the Secretary of State."

Mr. KEEFE. But that only applies to the regulation as to personnel.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not yield further. I do not have the time.

Mr. KEEFE. That only applies to personnel; that is all.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I am very much opposed to the amendment that was offered by our good friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], in view of the fact that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization is holding hearings at the present time on this refugee problem. We are hearing witnesses from all over the country relative to this matter.

There was a bill just introduced by myself that was reported out by a subcommittee of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, and I want to read it to you.

I want my good friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], to listen to this:

A bill to provide a temporary haven from the dangers of war for European children under the age of 16

Be it enacted, etc., That for a period not to exceed 2 years from the date of the enactment of this act, or for such shorter period as the President may prescribe, children under 16 years of age who are citizens or residents of any country in Europe and who, in the opinion of the United States consul before whom they appear for visas, are seeking to enter the United States to be safe from the dangers or the effects of war, may be issued visas as temporary visitors and temporarily admitted to the United States, notwithstanding that (1) they are under 16 years of age, unaccompanied by or not coming to one or both of their parents; (2) their tickets or passage is paid for with the money of another, or they are assisted by others to come; or (3) their tickets or passage is paid for by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign government, either directly or indirectly: Provided, however, That in all cases assurances have been given which satisfy the Attorney General that such children will be properly cared for and will not become public charges.

Such children shall be exempt from the payment of head tax and visa fees.

Such children may be admitted for a period of 2 years subject, however, to the power of the Attorney General to shorten or extend the period of admission upon a finding that such action would be in accordance with the purposes of this act.

SEC. 2. The Attorney General is authorized to prescribe and promulgate rules and regulations for the enforcement of this act, except that all such rules and regulations, insofar as they relate to the performance of functions by consular officers, shall be prescribed by the Secretary of State upon recommendation of the Attorney General.

Each and every one of us who profess to be sympathetic to the cause of bringing children into the United States from Europe and to help those children who are victims of the war, this is your chance, if you are not fooling. I agree with many of the Members here, but this is the time when we can show that we are a charitable people, with our hearts in sympathy with those who are victims of that terrible tragedy across the sea. Little do we realize what the children of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Belgium, Holland, France, and the Netherlands have endured in this European crisis, children wandering through the streets aimlessly, not knowing the whereabouts of their parents or whether they have survived the war. Being the peace-loving Nation that we are, and always ready to do all we can to help others, it is only the humanitarian thing for us to do to bring these small life victims to our shelter for the duration of the European war.

Under our present law not one child can come into this United States unless there is a guaranty by the person accepting the child to harbor it and to take care of it, that they are absolutely responsible for it at all times.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. Does not that law apply to this resolution that is under consideration today?

Mr. SCHULTE. Of course. It is on the statute books today. There is no need to rewrite immigration legislation at this particular time and in this bill.

My bill will be taken up for consideration in a few days and reported out. We want to go along and help these refugee children. There is a crying demand that something be done, certainly. We want to bring these children here. There are any number of applications on file today. Witnesses who have appeared before our committee have testified that there are applications now on file in the amount of 15,000 to 20,000 from families here in this country who are anxious to care for these refugee children through the duration of the war. Let us not throw anything in the way that will take these little tots out of the danger zone and bring them over here during the length of time that this war is on. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be advised as to the number of the last word that was stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I do not have anything of value to add to this debate. I did seek recognition for a minute or two just to give my views on this matter, but I could not get it.

This question is chock full of both pathos and tragedy, and yet in the midst of it here we are in this House making it a matter of considerable levity about these unfortunate children. I do not care where they come from—whether from England or Germany or France or from what country—but we ought not to have the proceedings of this deliberative body ruined by any horseplay of the kind we have just had here over whether or not it is going to cost a little money. Now, it is not going to cost any money. Surely there is no danger of tainting or polluting the stream of red blood in America to take these children, who are now under the very heels of the dictators and whose lives are either being crushed out or will be crushed out almost any night. Bringing them here is at least an act of mercy and the precautions that have been taken to get them out of the battlefields and away from almost certain death from bursting shells and deadly gas and burning flames is worthy the undertaking of any free peoples. The fact that we cannot bring all of them is no reason why we should not bring as many as we can. I believe that God will smile down upon America for doing the best that she can do to rescue them from the perilous places in which they find themselves without any fault of their own.

It is a serious matter. It is a fine thing that we are so constituted, we Americans, that we can pass from the sublime to the ridiculous without worry and in a hurry. We often do that. Here we have been engaged for 2 or 3 months in bickerings and disputes about preparedness, spending billions of dollars, if you please, to purchase war materials and then we are about to embark upon another phase of that work in determining whether we shall just buy that stuff to have or whether we expect to train men to use it. And then it is a splendid retreat—to me at least—to see the House able to get control of itself and march from the sordid fields of politics and war up to a matter so sublime as this matter concerning the welfare of little children.

I do not care so far as I am concerned where these children come from. I do not know how you view it but I feel that it is a mighty small contribution for the people of the greatest country on earth to make in this welter of blood and confusion that is engrossing the world to offer to take care of a few of these children; and I am not particularly concerned where they come from. I wish we could take care of every one of them.

I dislike to see men who I know have learning—and I know, of course, that all of us have or are supposed to have some of it—but when a man says he is unwilling to extend his helping hand to a child who is under the crushing iron heel of the great murderer of Europe because perhaps there is some other child who has not yet been rescued—we ought not to have that sort of attitude, that sort of spirit.

I think the best thing that could happen in these proceedings today is to have a lot of the levity engaged in deleted from the RECORD. Let us view this thing intelligently. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto, and all debate to this section close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the intention of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is to provide as far as possible that those who take charge of these refugee children accord them the same care, protection, and opportunity as they provide for their own. Most of them will do it, of course. But it is a good thing to put in the law. As I understand it, the British law does not permit the adoption of their children. I don't know about other European countries. I think if these children are to be taken into American homes, we should see to it, as far as we can, that they have whatever protection that may be afforded them. I know as well as you, these children are going to be taken with the very best of intentions, but it will do no harm to require the same responsibility as would be expected if they were the parents, and the children be afforded the same opportunities. I agree with those who have expressed their deepest sympathy for these unfortunate children. Thousands without homes, many of them separated from their parents, whom they will not see again. Children who lack food and shelter and no place to go. Then we have those children whose parents want their children to escape the terror of bombs and machine-gun fire that may overwhelm them at any time. They are innocent victims of a dreadful situation for which they are in nowise responsible.

Mr. Chairman, it may be possible that some of the enthusiasm on the part of some of our people will not run so high in a year or two or three from now. So I feel that any guaranties that may be fairly provided for these helpless children after they reach the United States will be extremely helpful and important. Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that this amendment should be placed in the immigration law. Perhaps it should. Personally, I see no objection to placing it right here in this bill. I think it is fair and should be supported. I expect to support the measure that is before us. I really believe this amendment will strengthen the measure, and add a little more help to these children who are going to need all the protection that may be afforded them. I think this amendment will help them. I trust you will support it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and, on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 89, noes 68.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNS: Page 1, line 8, after the word "children", insert "not exceeding 75,000 in number."

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard on the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the Committee all debate on this section has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCGRANERY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10213) to permit American vessels to assist in the evacuation from the war zones of certain refugee children, under the provisions of House Resolution 562, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the so-called Schafer amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Schafer amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 10, after the word "necessary", insert the words "American citizen."

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, is it possible, now that the Clerk has reported the Schafer amendment, to have the resolution read as it would be with the adoption of the Schafer amendment; in other words, to give an idea of how it would read with the Schafer amendment?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the resolution as affected by the Schafer amendment, if adopted.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) The provisions of sections 2 (a) and 3 shall not prohibit the transportation by vessels, in ballast, unarmed, and not under convoy, of refugee children, under 16 years of age, fleeing from war zones, together with such necessary American citizen adult personnel, etc.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the House divided; and there were—ayes 108, noes 78.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty-one Members are present, a quorum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MORE UNIFORM COVERAGE OF CERTAIN PERSONS EMPLOYED IN COAL-MINING OPERATIONS

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4070) to provide for more uniform coverage of certain persons employed in coal-mining operations with respect to insurance benefits provided by certain Federal acts, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER]?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 (a) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, section 1 (a) of the Carriers Taxing Act of 1937, section 1532 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code, and section 1 (a) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act are amended, effective in the case of each such act as of the date of its enactment, by adding at the end of each such section the following new sentence: "The term 'employer' shall not include any company by reason of its being engaged in the mining of coal, the supplying of coal to an employer where delivery is not beyond the mine tipple, and the operation of equipment or facilities therefor, or in any of such activities."

SEC. 2. Section 1 (a) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 and paragraph first of section 1 of the Railway Labor Act, as amended, are amended, effective in the case of each such act as of the date of its enactment, by adding at the end of each such section and paragraph the following new sentence: "The term 'carrier' shall not include any company by reason of its being engaged in the mining of coal, the supplying of coal to a carrier where delivery is not beyond the mine tipple, and the operation of equipment or facilities therefor, or in any of such activities."

SEC. 3. Section 1 (b) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, section 1 (b) of the Carriers Taxing Act of 1937, section 1532 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code, the first paragraph of section 1 (d) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, section 1 (b) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, and paragraph fifth of section 1 of the Railway Labor Act, as amended, are amended, in the case of each such act as of the date of its enactment, by adding at the end of each such section and paragraph the following new paragraph:

"The term 'employee' shall not include any individual while such individual is engaged in the physical operations consisting of the mining of coal, the preparation of coal, the handling (other than movement by rail with standard railroad locomotives) of coal not beyond the mine tipple, or the loading of coal at the tipple."

SEC. 4. (a) The laws hereby expressly amended, the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935, and all amendments thereto, shall operate as if each amendment herein contained had been enacted as a part of the law it amends, at the time of the original enactment of such law.

(b) No person (as defined in the Carriers Taxing Act of 1937) shall be entitled, by reason of the provisions of this act, to a refund of, or relief from liability for, any income or excise taxes paid or accrued, pursuant to the provisions of the Carriers Taxing Act of 1937 or subchapter B of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code, prior to the date of the enactment of this act by reason of employment in the service of any carrier by railroad subject to part I of the Interstate Commerce Act, but any individual who has been employed in such service of any carrier by railroad subject to part I of the Interstate Commerce Act as is excluded by the amendments made by this act from coverage under the Carriers Taxing Act of 1937 and subchapter B of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code, and who has paid income taxes under the provisions of such act or subchapter, and any carrier by railroad subject to part I of the Interstate Commerce Act which has paid excise taxes under the provisions of the Carriers' Taxing Act of 1937 or subchapter B of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code, may, upon making proper application therefor to the Bureau of Internal Revenue, have the amount of taxes so paid applied in reduction of such tax liability with respect to employment, as may, by reason of the amendments made by this act, accrue against them under the provisions of title VIII of the Social Security Act or the Federal Insurance Contributions Act (subchapter A of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code).

(c) Nothing contained in this act shall operate (1) to affect any annuity, pension, or death benefit granted under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 or the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, prior to the date of enactment of this act, or (2) to include any of the services on the basis of which any such annuity or pension was granted, as employment within the meaning of section 210 (b) of the Social Security Act or section 209 (b) of such act, as amended. In any case in which a death benefit alone has been granted, the amount of such death benefit attributable to services, coverage of which is affected by this act, shall be deemed to have been paid to the deceased under section 204 of the Social Security Act in effect prior to January 1, 1940, and deductions shall be made from any insurance benefit or benefits payable under the Social Security Act, as amended, with respect to wages paid to an individual for such services until such deductions total the amount of such death benefit attributable to such services.

(d) Nothing contained in this act shall operate to affect the benefit rights of any individual under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act for any day of unemployment (as defined in section 1 (k) of such act) occurring prior to the date of enactment of this act.

SEC. 5. Any application for payment filed with the Railroad Retirement Board prior to, or within 60 days after, the enactment of this act shall, under such regulations as the Social Security Board may prescribe, be deemed to be an application filed with the Social Security Board by such individual or by any person claiming any payment with respect to the wages of such individual, under any provision of section 202 of the Social Security Act, as amended.

SEC. 6. Nothing contained in this act, nor the action of Congress in adopting it, shall be taken or considered as affecting the question of what carriers, companies, or individuals, other than those in this act specifically provided for, are included in or excluded from the provisions of the various laws to which this act is an amendment.

SEC. 7. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1605 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code, no interest shall, during the period February 1, 1940, to the eighty-ninth day after the date of enactment of this act, inclusive, accrue by reason of delinquency in the payment of the tax imposed by section 1600 with respect to services affected by this act performed during the period July 1, 1939 to December 31, 1939, inclusive, with respect to which services amounts have been paid as contributions under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act prior to the date of enactment of this act.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1601 (a) (3) of the Internal Revenue Code the credit allowable under section 1601 (a) against the tax imposed by section 1600 for the calendar year 1939 shall not be disallowed or reduced by reason of the payment into a State unemployment fund after January 31, 1940, of contributions with respect to services affected by this act performed during the period July 1, 1939, to December 31, 1939, inclusive, with respect to which services amounts have been paid as contributions under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act prior to the date of enactment of this act: Provided, That this subsection shall be applicable only if the contributions with respect to such services are paid into the State unemployment fund before the ninetieth day after the date of enactment of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT

Mr. LEA of California submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (S. 2009) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by extending its application to additional types of carriers and transportation and modifying certain provisions thereof, and for other purposes.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 seconds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA]?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman take time enough to tell us when he expects to call up the conference report on this bill?

Mr. LEA. Monday morning; and I may say copies of the bill as agreed to in conference is available in the House at this time.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including at this point in the RECORD a statement by The Adjutant General of the Army covering voluntary enlistments for the period beginning the 1st of January this year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON].

There was no objection.

The statement referred to follows:

The following table shows enlistments for the months of January through June 1940 by State or residence, as tabulated from enlistment records received through August 3, 1940:

	Number of enlistments

E. S. ADAMS,
Major General, The Adjutant General.

Mr. THOMASON. In the month of June the total enlistments were 23,444. The enlistments for July are not quite complete. The record shows 31,958, but the War Department advises there may be about 2,000 not yet tabulated and recorded.

It should also be borne in mind that reenlistments for the first 6 months of this year were 20,538. The reenlistments for the month of June were 3,518 and 2,947 for the month of July. The losses, however, during these 2 months were approximately 15,991, which would leave a net gain in the Regular Army during those 2 months of 39,411.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill just agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM]?

There was no objection.

Mr. TENEROWICZ asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FULMER asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a report of the Committee on Interstate Trade Barriers and Unemployment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ELLIS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, at the conclusion of any previous special order, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MICHENER and Mr. HORTON asked and were given permission to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include excerpts from H. R. 7604 and S. 3876.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article written by Mr. Vanderpoel, the financial editor of the Chicago American, indicating the earnings of industrial corporations for the first half of 1940 as 11.4 percent net.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short editorial from the Chattanooga Times of August 6.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order heretofore made, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for 40 minutes.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, the hour is late, and I do not intend to take the 40 minutes that have been granted me. I have asked for this time to discuss certain phases of our national-defense problem in an effort to stimulate thinking, and not because I think I know all the answers. Like other Members of the House, I have lain awake nights and thought of these problems that the Congress now faces.

As I see it, there is nothing more important at the present time than that we have national unity in connection with providing for the strengthening of our national defense. Before we can have the desired national unity, the Congress and the country must be given all possible, relevant information; not, of course, military secrets. If anything, we have been too free in that direction in the years past. We have got to instill confidence. People must have reason to believe that the various national-defense bills enacted mean just what they appear to mean on the surface, that a bill providing a year's training for the National Guard must mean just that, and nothing more; that a bill providing for the expansion of essential industries must mean just that, and nothing more, and it must not be a vehicle that allows the Government to go into competitive, private business.

We had an example here in the House just recently of how important items can be injected into a bill almost without the knowledge of a majority of the Members of the House. I am referring to a provision inserted in a bill recently passed that would have allowed the Secretary of the Navy, at his discretion, to actually take over and operate any plant that he might declare to be necessary for the national defense. No one seems to know how that got into the bill. It appeared certainly in the first printed copy, after the bill had been passed and signed by the President, and then the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] offered an amendment to another bill suggesting that we strike that out. The conferees themselves say that it was not there when they considered it and, certainly, the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee made no reference to that important provision when he explained the conference report. The chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee showed a mighty fine spirit by coming into the House at the first opportunity and suggesting that that provision be removed.

We have appropriated billions of dollars for planes, battleships, arms, and munitions of all kinds, but the possession of this equipment alone is not going to solve our problems. We will soon be called upon to consider an elaborate bill for compulsory universal military training, and I intend to explain a little later why the Burke-Wadsworth bill is not what the people generally think it is. While we have considered more or less grandiose ideas, I am wondering if we have not been overlooking some of the helpful little things that might have been done in the past 3 months or that we might speedily do now that would be very helpful.

Three months have elapsed since the President's message on May 16. I am wondering just what we have done in that period to strengthen and improve the efficiency of our National Guard. The National Guard today is not up to its authorized peacetime strength. The guard should be up to its peacetime strength of 330,000. Instead of that we have authorized funds for only 280,000 and the guard has 263,000 actually enrolled at the present time. They have little or no equipment. In my own State of Connecticut we recently created an antiaircraft regiment out of a former cavalry outfit. A week ago they returned from 3 weeks' encampment. They had practically no equipment for training. The War Department did not have the equipment to send to them. They borrowed one piece of equipment from Massachusetts and another from Rhode Island, and did the best they could with the limited equipment they had. Many of those men left responsible positions in essential industries to devote 3 weeks to training, and somewhere along the line we fell down; we did not give them equipment with which to train.

I think the most important thing this Congress could do immediately to speed up the procurement program would be, as soon as possible—and I believe it could be done almost by unanimous consent—pass a concurrent resolution that would provide for the amortization of funds invested in plant expansion. We should follow that by immediately suspending the provisions of the Vinson-Trammell Act. The need of such action is borne out by testimony before the Appropriations Committee by both Admiral Towers of the Navy and General Brett of the Army, who testified that the failure of Congress to take such action is holding back our procurement program.

The uncertainty of what Congress will do in this respect has certainly interfered with negotiating contracts. I do not think we can rightfully blame industry. They are not asking, as I understand it, that we at once pass an excess-profits tax. I have been told that if we can take up the resolution for this amortization plan and repeal the Vinson-Trammell Act, that they are ready to go ahead. They know as well as we do that there is going to be an excess-profits tax, and that there should be an excess profits tax law passed. They cannot be passed overnight. It is safe to say that it will take a month for the House and the Senate to pass an excess-profits tax, and we cannot afford to wait a month before these essential contracts are awarded.

Under some of the legislation passed by this Congress we have actually penalized the two most important industries that will contribute most to the success of our national-defense program. They are the aircraft and shipbuilding industries. The President vehemently denied newspaper stories that the placing of contracts for aircraft and other defense material was being delayed by legislation passed in June, lowering the profit limitation on aircraft contracts from 12 to 8 percent and by the vague talk of an excess-profits levy.

I think the Members would be interested if I read into the RECORD a part of the testimony of Admiral John A. Towers, Chief, Bureau of Aeronautics, before the House Committee on Appropriations. He said:

> It is a fact that at the present time we are having great difficulty in placing contracts with the manufacturers. There was a law passed recently which greatly reduced the profit limitation on aircraft contracts. It was very materially reduced.
> Most of the aircraft manufacturers and all of the aircraft-engine manufacturers do a great deal of subcontracting, and their contracts are placed, for instance, with a firm which forges crankshafts. That is the business of that firm. They will take a subcontract from an aircraft-engine manufacturer, and that probably represents a small percentage of their total business.
> This law limits the subcontractors to the same profit, and their new profit when they are working on a limitation of 8 percent gross profit is very small. They are not anxious to get the business, and they can fill up their plants, so they say, with business from other sources, including munition manufacturers, which are not subject to the same profit limitations. That, coupled with the uncertainty about amortization of expanded plants and equipment, makes it very difficult to place those contracts.

Admiral Towers said he could cite a specific case in which a contract for 300 planes was awarded by the Navy "to a very large company, a very reputable company."

Subsequently legislation was passed cutting the profit limitation from 12 to 8 percent. The manufacturer called Admiral Towers that the various subcontractors who had previously agreed to do a part of the work were no longer interested in those contracts so the manufacturer just could not see how he could take the contract. The admiral declared that—

> That is a firm which has probably made the best record in aircraft production and has shown the most reasonable prices of any firm in this country in the last few years.

Gen. George H. Brett, Chief of the Matériel Division, Office of Chief of Air Corps, War Department, was even more emphatic in insisting that profit limitations and legislative uncertainties were making it impossible for the Army to buy airplanes. Said the general, in testifying:

> We had $279,000,000 appropriated for the purchase of airplanes available the first part of June, and on the 15th of June our contracts were all ready to be signed, under the proposed law which would permit us to negotiate contracts. Those contracts were held awaiting passage of the law, which was not signed until July 2. On June 29, however, there was a modification of the Vinson-Trammell Act which threw all of our contracts into the wastebasket, and we had to start all over again and negotiate those contracts.
> The negotiations had to be conducted on an entirely new basis. In the meantime we went to the Treasury and we are getting a decision with regard to taxes on expansion. We are getting a decision with regard to what can be considered costs under the Vinson-Trammell profit limitation. But now another objection has been made because there has been an announcement to the effect that the Vinson-Trammell Act is likely to be repealed and that there will be a tax on profits.
> Today I am doing my best to have the contracts signed. The industry will not sign contracts because they do not know what the effect will be if they repeal the Vinson-Trammell Act. Therefore, we are now again in a quandary over it. I am ready to buy approximately 4,000 airplanes, and that is the situation.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I did not hear all of my friend's remarks, but I happen to know something about the matter which the gentleman is talking. I am a member of the subcommittee on taxation. Is the gentleman offering any criticism of any committee of the House or any official of the Government because of the present predicament?

Mr. MILLER. I do not know whether it would be called a criticism. I was making a suggestion. I said the procurement program was lagging. I said there were two things that Congress could do to lessen such lagging. Apparently all are agreed that a 5-year amortization plan will be adopted. I am told that the Treasury has agreed to that program. Apparently it has the support of the administration right down the line. If that is true, we could pass that almost overnight. The Vinson-Trammel Act, apparently, is also going to be suspended. My suggestion was that those two items of the so-called three-point program now before your committee be adopted speedily and that your committee take whatever time is necessary to consider and adopt the excess profits tax bill, which I said should be passed.

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, that is very nice. I thoroughly agree that business should not be criticized, but is the gentleman aware that as far as any Member of Congress is concerned, the fact that the excess-profits tax was connected up with national defense, and the fact that these contracts were being held up pending the passage of legislation, was only known within the past week?

Mr. MILLER. To whom? I have just quoted Admiral Towers and General Britt testifying before the House Appropriations Committee weeks ago on this subject. They both say our failure to act is holding up their program.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is the gentleman aware that 3 weeks or so ago a statement was made by Mr. Knudsen and some Members of the House and Senate as to what legislation would undoubtedly pass with reference to amortization and the suspension of the Vinson-Trammell Act? The Vinson-Trammell Act should not be repealed, but it should be suspended during the operation of the excess-profits tax. That statement was made in the hope that it would induce contractors to sign, but 3 weeks later Mr. Knudsen reported that, while he had hoped it, his hopes had materialized only to a very limited extent.

Mr. MILLER. I can assure the gentleman that they will not materialize simply because Representatives of the House say they will pass it.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am not criticizing. I think the gentleman's position is fair. My purpose is to correct any erroneous views honestly entertained by the gentleman. If we were in war our manufacturers would do anything. At the present time I am not criticizing them, but, on the other hand, I want to say to my friend that no criticism, expressed or implied, should be made of any Member of Congress, because since that matter has been known the subcommittee of which I am a member has been working morning and afternoon. We completed our report last night and the report is being drafted to be made to the full committee, upon which public hearings will be held on Tuesday. For whatever value my opinion may be worth, while I appreciate the suggestion of my friend from Connecticut, it is absolutely essential for interested business to know what the excess-profits tax will be, and that the tax law be passed, in addition to the amortization and the suspension of the Vinson-Trammell Act.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman's opinion is worth a great deal to the House, as the gentleman well knows. But the question of excess-profits tax is not the chief concern of the manufacturers of aircraft, aircraft engines, and guns. They are willing to go ahead. I have talked to representatives of some of the largest units. They are not only willing but glad to go ahead if you suspend the Vinson-Trammell Act and adopt the 5-year amortization plan. They are willing for you to take your own sweet time on the excess-profits tax.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am glad to receive that information, because it is not the type of information that I, as a member of the subcommittee, have received. The information I have received is that the businessmen would like to see the law, would like to see what it is going to be, and I do not blame them. But, on the other hand, the information is with reference not only to the amortization and the suspension of the Vinson-Trammell Act but the excess-profits tax. Furthermore, why should we as Members of Congress give accelerated depreciation, a very good amortization plan, without completing the whole program and passing the excess-profits tax bill? In any event, hearings will be completed on Monday or Tuesday of next week, in all probability, and I am hopeful that the bill will pass the House before the latter part of next week, in which event I am confident, it being linked up with national defense, that the Senate would not take much time in which to pass the bill.

Mr. MILLER. I predicted before the gentleman came in that it will take a month from this day before that bill is passed and signed by the President. I think it would be a mistake to hold up the first two provisions because of the latter. The matter of excess-profits tax is not of concern to them for this reason. They know it is going to be passed, and whether they make 2 percent or 4 percent or 12 percent, everything above a normal profit will be taken away from them, and it should be. But the provisions of the Vinson-Trammell Act and the amortization plan are decidedly different in their effect on the negotiation of contracts.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is not the information that I and other members of the subcommittee on taxation have received. The information we have received from responsible sources——

Mr. MILLER. From representatives of some of the major industries?

Mr. McCORMACK. I assume that members of the Advisory Committee on National Defense are in a position to know, and the information we have received—only the other day Mr. Knudsen appeared before the subcommittee, the day before yesterday, and with the full subcommittee there, my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], making a statement for the Republican members, the gentleman from Tennessee, Chairman COOPER, making a statement with Mr. Knudsen there, that the subcommittee was going to recommend the suspension of the Vinson-Trammel Act during the operation of the excess profits; was going to recommend a 5-year amortization plan; that if the emergency was over at the end of 3 years we would allow them to have 33⅓-percent amortization instead of 20 percent over 5 years. That statement was made. The gentleman from Tennessee, Chairman COOPER, also said that he could speak for the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and that he joined with him in his statement. The chairman of the full committee, Mr. DOUGHTON, also made a statement, all in the hope that businessmen would make these contracts before we actually passed the law. It was a hope. We have even gone to that extent. I do not know how much further we can go. Certainly the excess-profits tax ought to be passed with the other two important elements.

Mr. MILLER. I see no connection between the other two and as the gentleman has indicated everybody who has studied this problem feels that the first two points should be taken care of, and I do not know of any objection to taking care of them. Certainly you have heard Mr. Knudsen, but you should get the viewpoint of the people involved in these matters, you should invite into the committee representatives of the industry concerned. I realize they are in conference with Mr. Knudsen, but if there is any difference of opinion, if there is any belief, and there is in certain industries that the first two points of that three-point program if you want to call it that, are being held for consideration of the third as leverage to get the third point through just the way the administration wants to get it through——

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is too fair to make a statement that I know is without foundation. In fact, the information we have is that the businessmen want to see the entire law passed before they enter into the contracts.

Mr. MILLER. Just a minute. My only suggestion is to get that information from the manufacturers and not from representatives of the Government.

Mr. McCORMACK. They are going to have that opportunity. We are holding public hearings starting Friday. Mr. Knudsen came into the executive session of the subcommittee as the Chairman of the Advisory Board. All we have had before us have been officials, the same as any other committee in executive session considering a preliminary, ex parte matter, to be the basis of public hearings by the whole committee. Certainly the impression should not go out that businessmen were not invited, because they had no place in there. They will have an opportunity to be heard Friday at the public hearings. Mr. Knudsen appeared in his official capacity as Chairman of the Advisory Committee.

Mr. MILLER. I cannot yield further. There is no use proceeding further along that line. I have not criticized anyone. I have simply made a suggestion. I did not say that industry was denied the opportunity of appearing before your committee. I say they should be given an opportunity to appear and state their views.

Mr. McCORMACK. And they will be given that opportunity Friday. The hearings so far have simply been exploratory.

Mr. MILLER. Exploratory or not, the suggestion was that the representatives of the industries concerned should be heard; that your committee, either as individuals or as a committee, should hear representatives of the industry.

Mr. McCORMACK. They will be given that opportunity Friday.

Mr. MILLER. They will appear undoubtedly.

Mr. McCORMACK. I hope when they do appear they will not appear through paid representatives. The committee likes to see the men in the industry, not their paid representatives. It is all right to have representatives appear, but businessmen interested in any pending legislation should also appear. They make a bad business mistake in not doing so, as well as failing in their civic duty.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman care to yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am very much in sympathy with the thought that we should dispose of these two proposals before we go into the excess-tax formula. While one or two members of the Ways and Means Committee are here now, I want to serve notice on the committee in this informal manner that I want to be heard by that committee on the excess-tax feature.

I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Connecticut that it will be 30 days, and maybe longer, before we get the whole three propositions through. We are going to have to discuss the question of what constitutes excess profits. We have got to go into the question of the business cycle. We have got to go into the question of new industries that have been developed entirely within the last 4, 5, or 6 years, starting from scratch and working up to maybe $1,500 a year profits and then on to $300,000 or $400,000 a year. They will now find themselves presented with a 40-percent tax on 6, 8, or 10 percent of the invested capital. So I am inclined to believe that we will not get through this thing in a month. There will be further executive sessions of the Ways and Means Committee, and then it will be considered thoroughly on the floor of the House and the Senate. It will linger along for 30 days and maybe longer.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I hope it will not take that long, but I am glad to hear my friend say that he wants to appear before the committee, because some of us supposed-to-be-radical Democrats, as we are called by some businessmen, need the assistance of some of you Republican Members to restrain the so-called conservative Republicans from imposing confiscatory rates. The only evidence I have seen of confiscatory rates in the discussions we have had in the committee is when the Republicans suggest them. We have great difficulty in keeping the Republicans from imposing higher rates.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman from Massachusetts has made a contribution without any invitation. Let me say in reply that the country never has been afraid of the Republicans. The country is afraid of the President now, and that is the reason the country wants to keep Congress here. The country never has been afraid of the Republicans.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKEOUGH. As I understand the gentleman's suggestion, he hopes that both the amortization plan and the Vinson-Trammell feature will be suspended prior to the time Congress considers the excess-profits tax?

Mr. MILLER. I do hope that the Vinson-Trammell Act will be repealed and a fair amortization plan adopted at once without waiting for tax legislation recapturing excess profits.

Mr. McKEOUGH. I further take it from his contribution that it has been indicated to the gentleman that some very vital individual in the defense plan of the industrial fabric has made that recommendation to him. On the premise that if the Congress were to enact the amortization plan coupled with the suspension of the Vinson-Trammell Act requirements, industry would proceed without any further delay to accept from the advisory council and the Procurement Division of the Army and Navy the necessary contracts with which to lay down the finished article for defense?

Mr. MILLER. That is my recommendation.

Mr. McKEOUGH. I thought I understood the gentleman correctly. I would like the gentleman to yield for another observation. In the event that the gentleman can make known to those who have reported that statement to him that the subcommittee jointly speaking for the Senate, as evidenced by Senator HARRISON's approval and the full committee as evidenced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] agreeing with the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] that those two factors are to be covered in the manner that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] has indicated, I wonder if the gentleman can ask those who made the objection to him if there is any further reason for delay in accepting the contracts that are necessary for the defense program of this country?

Mr. MILLER. I do not have to ask anybody that. Supposing a contract was entered into as of today, with the laws just as they are today.

Mr. McKEOUGH. I am speaking about these changes.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman says he can assure industry that the changes will be made.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. That assurance is not worth anything to them, because when they take the contract, today or tomorrow, are they going to operate under the Vinson-Trammell Act or are they going to operate outside of it?

Mr. McKEOUGH. If the gentleman does not know, industry knows whatever this excess-profits tax may be, and whatever action is taken on the suspension of the Vinson-Trammell Act and the amortization plan will obviously apply either from the first of this year or from the declaration of an emergency by the President.

Mr. MILLER. There is nobody can assure industry that.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Assuming they can, does the gentleman want to convey to Congress, speaking for some section of industry——

Mr. MILLER. I am speaking for myself as a Member of the House.

Mr. McKEOUGH. The gentleman is relaying it from a section of industry.

Mr. MILLER. I have not indicated any such thing.

Mr. McKEOUGH. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. I am representing the constituents of my district.

Mr. McKEOUGH. That includes some engaged in the war-defense program?

Mr. MILLER. We have two or three working on it up there.

Mr. McKEOUGH. The gentleman does not want to indicate to the Congress that there is any feature of industry in the United States, assuming that industry as a whole accepts the presence of an existing emergency, would quibble about what the excess profits might be when the Congress is considering drafting human beings to go to war?

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman is putting words in my mouth. I have said as plainly as I can that industry knows that there is going to be an excess-profits tax and that any unreasonable profit will be taken away from them. The question of amortization and the question of suspending the Vinson-Trammell Act are decidedly different. There is nobody in this Government who can assure them just what will be done until such laws are passed by the Congress.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Assuming it is passed tomorrow, they will not proceed until it is passed; is that the demand of industry?

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman has heard the testimony before his committee.

Mr. McKEOUGH. No; I have not heard a single businessman make that contribution.

Mr. MILLER. Is the gentleman on the subcommittee?

Mr. McKEOUGH. I am not on it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Briefly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There is no way on earth that responsible management can proceed until the question is answered which the gentleman is proposing. It is not a question of loyalty, patriotism, or anything else. It is a question of balance sheets, operating statements, and responsibility to stockholders.

Mr. MILLER. I think we all understand that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is in line with the capitalistic system.

Mr. MILLER. I said at the outset that the bringing about of national unity did not mean there could not be constructive criticism.

The next matter I wish to refer to perhaps could be termed criticism, and I hope constructive criticism. I think we all agree that we want all possible speed in connection with national-defense preparation, all the speed we can have and still have safety, and I want to point out a situation that apparently exists, and I am depending on information that I believe is reliable. I have been told that last month—and I will insert the dates in the RECORD—14 contracts were sent over from the Navy Department, all completed, everything ready to start the work except they were lacking the signature of the President, and that these 14 contracts stayed in the White House for 11 days. Now, if that is so and we are embarking on an extensive program, I think it is something we might well look into to find out and determine why it is necessary for the contracts of the War and Navy Departments, in the first place, to have the signature of the President, and if so, why they should be held up for 11 days.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield, briefly.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Did the gentleman make inquiry at the White House to find out whether or not that was the situation by contacting and making inquiry formally or otherwise?

Mr. MILLER. I made inquiry that satisfies myself that that is true. I have no contacts with the White House, as the gentleman well knows.

Mr. McKEOUGH. I do not know why not. The gentleman is a Member of the Congress. Will the gentleman state for the purposes of the RECORD, in view of the very serious charge he has made, the source of his information so that the matter may be investigated?

Mr. MILLER. I indicated the source as being very reliable, and the facts can be ascertained very readily as to whether the contracts lay there 11 days or not.

Mr. McKEOUGH. I would like the gentleman, for the benefit of myself and any other Member who may be interested, to indicate how I might inquire into that, as I am very much interested.

Mr. MILLER. You can inquire whether there were 14 contracts signed on the 12th day of July that had been in the President's office or in the White House for 11 days prior to that time that were sent over by the Navy Department.

Mr. McKEOUGH. And were unsigned?

Mr. MILLER. I do not know whether they were unsigned or not, but they remained there for 11 days.

Mr. McKEOUGH. The gentleman does not know whether they were signed or otherwise?

Mr. MILLER. That is immaterial. There was a delay there of 11 days, and they were of course signed by the President before he returned them to the Navy Department.

Mr. McKEOUGH. The gentleman is just making the statement for the purpose of declaring that the President is delaying the program—is that the purpose of your implication?

Mr. MILLER. If that is the way you want to interpret it—the program was delayed for 11 days.

Mr. McKEOUGH. And your statement is that the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, is maliciously delaying the program——

Mr. MILLER. I cannot yield further, if you are going to use the word "maliciously."

Mr. McKEOUGH. The gentleman is implying——

Mr. MILLER. I am not implying anything.

Mr. McKEOUGH. What was the purpose, then, of offering that suggestion?

Mr. MILLER. So that somebody with more influence than I have will try to work out some plan so the President will not have to sign every single contract in this entire program.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Has the gentleman introduced a bill or resolution to bring that about?

Mr. MILLER. A resolution is not necessary, and I decline to yield further after the word "malicious" has been brought into this discussion.

For the remaining 5 or 10 minutes I want to make a few observations on the Burke-Wadsworth bill. I stated at the outset of this discussion that I thought the Burke-Wadsworth bill was more than the general public understood it to be; that is, it is more than a conscription training program. I am not ducking or hedging on this proposal. I want to do whatever is necessary to meet the emergency, but I want to do it in the way that will affect our national economy the least and make sure, insofar as possible, that every citizen carries his share of the load but no more and no less.

The Burke-Wadsworth bill attempts to solve two separate problems in one piece of legislation. It attempts to provide the manpower which is needed right now to bring our Regular Army up to the strength desired by General Marshall, and it also intends to provide a training program for young men, who will be trained at some time in the near future when we may need them. I believe that the President of the United States should, insofar as possible, take the people of this country into his confidence. He should tell them just what his policy is to be, and whether or not he proposed to respond to every request for military assistance that may come from the South American republics. In other words, he should tell them as much as he can about the emergency he discusses so frequently. Is his information such that he believes we are in imminent danger of military attack from some European or Asiatic source? Does he think that the attack will be made against South America, and that we will be called upon to assist our South American neighbors? These questions are being asked by the young men of the country who are thinking about the possibility of being asked to give 1 year of their life to the service of the Government.

Our first big job, assuming that the present emergency is even one half as acute as many believe it is, is to acquire an adequately equipped and strong initial protective force. Apparently, from the testimony of General Marshall and others, this protective force should, at the present time, consist of 375,000 men. We have increased the Regular Army from 165,000 to 263,000 during the past few months. This force, with the addition of various National Guard units, Reserve officers, and Regular Army Reserves, will exceed the 375,000 men which General Marshall feels we need at this time. Let us see just what we have in the way of manpower for an initial protective force. We have a Regular Army of 263,000 men, a National Guard of 242,000 men, we have 116,000 members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, we have 38,000 in the Regular Army Reserve, and approximately 3,700 retired officers subject to call for active duty. This gives us a total of more than 556,000 officers and men. Of this huge force, however, only 165,000 men have had any great amount of training. Therefore, our first problem is to bring the balance of the 556,000 men up to the highest point of efficiency in the shortest possible time.

It seems to me that if we disturb the training program of this group by calling into the service 400,000 recruits by October 1, we will interfere with the efficient training of this protective force, which we definitely need. I think it is fair to assume that if 400,000 recruits were brought into the service, we would have to take about 25 percent of our so-called protective force away from its various units to be used as instructors for the new force.

Apparently, under the provisions of the Burke-Wadsworth bill, the 400,000 trainees called into service for 1 year's training would be assigned to various Regular Army and National Guard organizations. They would become an integral part of the organization to which they had been assigned and, for example, in case of trouble in South America, they would be expected to go along with this organization with which they had been trained. After we have the proposed initial protective force at its highest point of efficiency, then it will be time enough to embark on a training program to give us the needed further Reserve. I believe that that can be worked out by largely expanding the Citizens Military Training Camps. It is almost unbelievable that, although this emergency was called to the attention of Congress on May 16, nothing has been done during this summer to expand the citizens' military training camps.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Is it not possible to get this idea, that we limit the service to 1 year, that we raise the pay to $30 as in the Navy and C. C. C. and try out the volunteer service before we enact the other? I would like to see that considered and I would like to have the gentleman's judgment on that.

Mr. MILLER. I say to the gentleman that I do not believe the volunteer system can raise 400,000 men in the 2 months, nor am I convinced that it is necessary to raise that number of men in that period of time. I would not hesitate for a minute to adopt some form of selective service if the men who are called for a year's training under a form of selective service are assured that they will not be used as part of an offensive army and that they will not be shipped outside of the continental limits of the United States without their consent, until Congress declared an actual state of war to exist. If we are going to call 400,000 into the military service specifically for training purposes, they should be called under the provisions of a selective service act, as that is the only fair way, to my mind, to select such a large number of men.

Great Britain is now convinced of that because of her experience during the early years of the World War. In 1914 thousands of Britain's finest young men rushed to the colors in response to a call for volunteers. Many of them were killed in the early months of the war and by 1916 Great Britain was feeling a very definite shortage of officers and noncommissioned officers' material.

In any rapid expansion of the Army and Navy I believe we should and will have to turn to a selective service act—call it conscription, if you will.

Mr. KELLER. Do I get from your present expression the same idea that I had, that is, the Regular Army has its hands full and then some to take these 116,000 young officers and train them and at the same time train the National Guard, without calling in anybody else?

Mr. MILLER. I certainly agree with that.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I want the gentleman's comment on this: The gentleman has pointed out how industry is refusing to volunteer for the national defense unless and until terms are made satisfactory to them——

Mr. MILLER. Until they are made clear, I may say, rather than satisfactory.
